The following poems, which are devoted to singing the praises of Macatawa, are called out by the offer of a prize by the editor for the best verses on that subject. It bappened one day last summer, as the editor was returning from a trip to Saugatuck on the little steamer Lizzie Walsh, that, coming in full view of Macatawa, as it lay all green and gold under the afternoon sun, he burst forth in rash enthusiasm with an offer of $5 for the best poem on Macatawa. The readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST are to be the jury of award. The poems are published without names, but each is designated by a letter (which is not an Initial). So let all who feel an interest in this subject and wish to erjoy the sweet consciousness of being patrous of literature—at the editor's expense—send in an expression of their opinion. The prize will not be awarded if not less than twenty-five votes are cast. Replies must be repeived within two weeks from date of issue of this paper.

Fair Macatawa.

There lake-surfs on the sand dunes sound The long roll of toe thunder drum; And chasing, white sea-pillows come Like leaping chargers shoreward bound.

There sunset paints, there pine plumed hill, Or mounlit path of watery gold; There storm clouds gather, fold on fold, And gusty giants walk at will.

Chere summer days dream long and find Sweet fellowships; there glinting run Both fish and thought; there tales are spun, And beach-songs float on evening wind.

Forever over, for defense A wakeful eye waits life to save— The feeble life from struggling wave— And shield from folly's consequence.

So, Father, may thine eye defend Thine erring children, and the wrong They follow often and so long Furn from them, guide them to the end!

Macatawa.

Bright Macatawa! Green Macatawa! When first thy glit'ring silver beach I saw, With fairy wood ands rising from the shore And blending with the blue sky evermore,
I wonlered if it were some vision true,
Or had my fancy strayed to regions new?
The boat in which I sat soon reached the land, While waves of music floated from the band, And filled the air within the space around With rising floods of most delicious sound.

Was I in dreamland, and was this vision clear Made out of things that only do appear And are not real in a worthy sense, But where our ide'ls give full recompense? It matters not how this can be explained; Some visions here, to eyes which are not trained, Seem far too beautiful for this sad earth, And hence in dreams, we think, they had their birth.

But whether wake or sleep I care not now; Thou fairy land! I put a wreath upon thy brow And crown thee Q seen of every wat'ring place, Where all may come from every clime and race.

Bright Macatawa! Green Macatawa! Thou art the paradox of nature's law! Thou art both white and green, both hot and Thou art both white and green, both hot and cold!

Thy days are few and yet thou art quite old!
Thou art a place—indeed the very best—
Where weary, struggling souls find peaceful rest.
I sought thee for some quick and sure relief,
And found it, though my stay was all too brief.
Still I am glad on life's highway we met,
And now I leave thee with profound regret.

Macatawa.

I love thy quiet, woodland walks, Thy sand-hills crowned with trees; I love to watch thy forest bend Before the gentle breeze.

I love to stroll with genial friend Through thy deep shaded ways, And note how nature joins with man To speak our Father's praise.

I love, alone, to tread thy paths, Free from the world's mad strife, And ponder all God's loving care, That guards our human life.

I love the meetings on the beach, Beneath God's chandeliers, Where stars look down and hearts look up To Him who rules the spheres.

I love to hear thy breakers roar, When whitecaps, far, are seen Like flocks of sheep in gambols free On some broad meadow green.

But most I love, at eventide, When the daily task is done, To sit and muse beside thy lake, And watch the setting sun.

How gorgeous is the going down Far o'er the waters blue, When clouds reflect his radiant beams In changing form and hue.

And when the sable robes of night Shut out the light of day, I love to trace the moon's bright path Across the watery way.

Far out toward the golden west, The land of promise fair, Where stalwart men are building states, Not castles in the air.

I love thy woods, I love thy lakes, I love thy bracing air; I love the folks who love thy charms, O Macatawa fair!

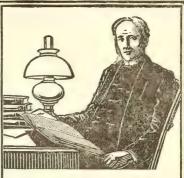

STRUGGLING TOWARD THE

BY WALTER S. SMITH.

Chapter V .- The Luzon Meeting.

When the evening came, the audience filled the house. The two preachers sang together a selection or two and Paul took the stand to preach. It was a new role for him; but he was glad to try it. He had confidence enough in himself to display but little embarrassment; and Timothy, being so much his inferior in age and attainment, sat at his feet to learn. There was not a more respectful listener in the house; and even when an unguarded lady said to some one (more loudly than she supposed) that she would "ever so much rather hear the little preacher," he did not display a sign of self-consciousness.

The meeting was on at once. Sunday morning Paul spoke on Christianity as a Civilizing Force. Timothy "timed" the sermon, and showed a shade of disappointment. It was but a half hour and two minutes in length; and he wanted to listen at least an hour. But when the lady again came forward, and brought her husband with her, and when Henry witnessed the process of receiving the husband's confession, and when the communi n was served he felt satisfied and strangely pleased. And yet he was not pleased with his own part in the exercises. He had shaken his head when the plate was offered to him, and had allowed the loaf to pass on. Try as he would, he could not remember the authority or the instruction by which Baptists refuse to commune with the Disciples; and yet he knew they do it, and he had done it. The night sermon was on CHRISTIAN UNION; and as the professor proceeded in the discussion of Schism and Sectarian Isolation, the younger man saw for the first time the inspiration of his own meeting. For instance, there would have been no embarrassment in taking Mrs. Marshall's confession, if he had been free to proceed in the language of the New Testament. And so, too, he could have partaken of the communion, if only he had remembered what the Scriptures say, instead of trying to remember what Baptist authorities say.

And when Paul, in his sermon, said he had known one of the best of men to be excluded for quoting the Pentecostal Scripture the red darted through his face and he felt embarrassed.

Timothy went to his room profoundly moved. He reviewed the Norris matter, and now saw the propriety of all Norris had said. Especially did he feel the force of his final word: "Brethren, I cannot be disloyal to the Holy Spirit for the sake of lovalty to the Baptist Church." He reviewed also his own anxiety to justify himself, and remembered the caution of the brother at the Bend, who reminded him that he was saying entirely too much on that subject. So, after a long time, he dropped off in sleep, to dream of a good handshake with Job Norris, and of taking up a residence in his cottage.

Monday, he stayed in, and read most of the day from Armitage's History of the Baptists. He discovered there, that nobody had ever successfully answered Alexander Campbell's heresies, "until Dr. Jeter came along." But he inwardly noted that, if Alexander Campbell's works were as clear and as logical as Prof. Guthrie's three sermons had been. Dr. Jeter would not be able to answer them.

Monday night there was a discussion on The Law of the Lord; and the Baptist laws, to which he had wanted to be so loyal, appeared to pale in contrast with the authority of God.

After reaching his room, he took his Bible and read all the passages Paul had quoted, with their connection. Such expressions as will, and power, and authority, all seemed to bristle with new meaning; and he retired, believing one might be a faithful member of a sectarian church, and yet remain disloyal to God. He told his wife that he would like to return to Sunrise and the Bend and preach over again his sermons on Loyalty.

Ruby had not said much up to this time; but now she ventured to remark: "I was just thinking that my change out of the Methodist Church appeared incomplete. I have heard these people at Sunrise, and they always seemed to have the Bible on their side. I have rarely heard a poor sermon from them."

Tuesday forenoon, Paul walked about the village. In one of the shops he met a young man whose face betokened dissatisfaction, and he frankly asked: "Mr. George, wouldn't you feel better satisfied if you were in the church?" The young man looked up with a quiver in his eye lids, and said, with a quiver in his voice. "I am a raid I am not fit, sir!" Paul took his hand and said, "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."

The listener's eyes moistened, and he turned about to his work at the bench; but when Paul told him to come around to the afternoon meeting, he thanked him and promised to come.

When Paul ended his remarks with a touching appeal to sinners to submit themselves to the authority of him who said "thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness," he stepped forward and offered his hand. He came, as did the husband and wife, prepared for the ordinance of baptism. Together with the ministers and the audience, numbering about sixty, they repaired to the stream, and the sacred rite was administered. There is no service more impressive; and so all felt to-day.

Timothy went to the farm-house opened for their accommodation, with the preacher and the baptized, and was active in assisting the two young men in changing their apparel. When Paul returned to his vehicle to be driven back to Luzon, the young preacher clambered in with him. He evidently desired to say something; and under cover of the noise made by the wheels he began: "Professor, if you will satisfy my mind upon one point, I will offer myself for membership in the Christian Church. Tell me where you get the authority for inviting everybody to the communion?"

Paul smiled at this, and answered interrogatively: "Did you hear me invite everybody?"

"Well, no! I supposed you neglected it, by accident."

"Did you ever hear any of our ministers offer such an invitation?"

"I am not sure that I ever did; but they do, do they not?"

"No, they never do! At any rate, if one should do so, he would transcend his authority. We have no more right to invite than to repel. It is the Lord's table, and all we can do is to put it in readiness and then say, 'let a man examine himself, and so let him eat.' This is the first light I obtained from Job Norris; and since hearing him, two years ago, I have observed very carefully, and all the preachers say the same."

Timothy answered somewhat impulsively, "I see it all. I have thought of this passage before, but candidly it seems new to me now. My last objection is gone; and I only want the opportunity to be one of the freest people on earth."

Paul was stopping with one of the elders whose ample house and easy circumstances rendered the entertainment of the preacher a real pleasure to him; and the preacher's room upstairs was well provided. Books were in easy reach; and he found this a great advantage. Being his first meeting of the evangelistic sort, it kept him busy to bave sermons prepared ahead. Questions like this from Timothy were full of suggestion; and he lost no time in making this a subject for special study. He at once noted the points already determined as so much matter for next Lord's day sermon on The Communion.

That evening he spread on a blackboard three Scripture passages which he read and commented upon before the last song preceding his discourse. The first was James 4:17: "To him that knoweth to do good and doth it not to him it is sin." The second: "Man looketh on the outward appearance; but God looketh on the heart" (1 Sam. 16:7); the third: "Ye shall know them by their fruits" (Matt. 7:16.) On each of these passages he spent a little time, as he said, to set his audience to thinking "for the gospel is aimed for people who think." In the sermon he addressed himself to the theme of Christian fellowship; showing its advantages, and its requirements. The church was a fraternity, a firm, a composite, a partnership, a body politic, with mutual obligations and with well defined duties. "A congregation is bound to its divine head, and it cannot do things that displease its author without disloyalty. When one takes his place in the kingdom he has changed rulers, and thenceforth Christ is to be his Master. God has not left the fellowship without instruction; for a division of the New Testament is devoted to church tactics; to lessons of decorum; to directions in the matter of edification. I mean the epistles writen by Paul, James, Peter, John and Jude. They constitute a joint lecture, from the Holy Spirit, to direct us in Christian duty. In them we may readily understand what God wants us, as Christians, to do." He then closed with an invitation to such a fraternal place.

V .- How the Tramp Talked to Edgar.

The tramp stopped when he saw that Edgar Brown meant to accost him. They were in an alley with the backs of barns on both sides and old tin cans and wornout shoes scattered over the damp ground,-it was generally damp in that narrow alley,and nobody could see you except from the ends. Lucifer, who had been very unhappy ever since Edgar had led him away from Linda May, now seemed to take an interest in life once more, and showed an obstinate desire, as inconvenient as it was disreputable, of wanting to smell the tramp. Edgar had to hold him back with all his might while Lucifer strained his nostrils and hung on the whipcord, trying to get nearer.

"Keep that dog off," said Nap gruffly. Lucifer made no noise. He did not even bare his teeth. All he asked was to smell Nap at a closer range.

"You are the tramp I saw yesterday," said Edgar abruptly.

"I'm not a tramp," said Nap fiercely.

"What are you, then?" retorted Elgar.

"I'm on the road," said the other. "You go on and leave me alone and take that dog with you." He was a larger man than Edgar, and he looked dangerous, for there was an ugly scowl upon his face. But Edgar wasn't afraid.

"You can call yourself what you please," said the young man, "but to decent people you're a tramp. And I'm tired of seeing you around. And I want you to leave Mizzouryville before dark, and never come back here again. And I tell you now that if you don't go at once you'll be sorry."

"Oh," said Nap, "so you're tired of seeing me around! And you want me to leave before dark! And you want to tell me now! And you say I'll be sorry! And who are you, I'd like to know? Are you the marshal and mayor and the board of aldermen and also the secretary and treasurer? Or does the town belong to you and you've leased out its streets to them you wants to walk on um?"

"You can take your choice," said Edgar calmly. "You can either get away at once, or I'll have you working on the rockpile to-morrow. Hold back, Lucifer!" For the dog was so eager to get closer to Nap that his forepaws were clear off the ground, and he was about to hang himself.

The tramp pointed his finger at Edgar and said in an ugly voice, "I know who sent you to bother me in my rights. Morris has got you to do this dirty work."

"I do not know Mrs. Morris," said Edgar. "I have never seen nor spoken to any one here of that name. She did not get me to run you out of town. But I'm tired of seeing you around, and you have to go. Now, that's plain talking."

"Yes it is," said Nap. "And when it comes to plain talking, I don't let nobody shine over me. And I tell you now that if you have me arrested, I'll tell every blessed speck of Mrs. Morris's secret. You say you don't know her. Maybe you do and maybe you don't. I think you do. I think you speak false words, sir. But however that may be, you fool with me, and I'll tell her secret. Now, that's all I got to say. You go on arrestin'. And if you put me on the rockpile, I'll shout that secret to everybody that passes. I'll make a song of it, and beat time to it, and I'll have an audience if they's anybody here that can appreciate good music. But I tell you what I'd advise you to do. I'd advise you to go ast Mrs. Morris first, if she would like my program. If you don't know her, you can get an introduction. But if it ain't nothin' to you, her troubles, just go ahead. I'm shore I can stand it. So just drive on, young feller, and crack yore whip."

"I have never met Mrs. Morris," said Edgar, "but of course I have no wish to get any lady into trouble. And I warn you that if you try to invent a tale about her, in the first place nobody will believe you, and in the second place, you will have the White Caps after you. It hasn't been long since they took a tramp to the woods and gave him a thorough beating. Then he was glad enough to leave town."

"As for the White Caps," said Nap, looking down his long nose, "I ain't no cause to be skeered of them, for I am a White Cap myself. As for inventin' a tale on Mrs. Morris, I ain't no poet nor no inventor, and I can only tell what I have saw and what has happened and been. If Mrs. Morris is a friend of yours, you'd better leave me be. But if you're her enemy, go ahead and prosecute me, and force her secret out of my bosom!'

"I have given you warning," said Edgar, turning away with a bold front, but secretly wondering what he was to do.

"Yes, and I have gave you warning," Nap called after him. "You have came after me in the wrong way, young feller. Nap can't be drove. You can catch Nap with molasses, but he have the indigestion and it's long sence he et pickles. You just crack yore whip, young feller."

Edgar dragged away his dog with a keen sense of failure. He was greatly perplexed. He had never seen Mrs. Morris, and he wondered what kind of a person she was, and what kind of a secret she could have. He had not been so interested since the days that lady who didn't marry him made him think that she might. He was glad he had stopped in Mizouryville. But how he could get rid of the tramp was a tormenting puzzle.

Just then his mind was attracted to the strange behavior of Lucifer. The dog showed a determined wish to take the lead. Finally the young man allowed him to do so. being curious to see where he was so anxious to go. Lucifer, finding that he was to be humored, settled down to a comfortable gait and led Edgar out of town, straight toward the deep woods on the north. They entered the woods, Lucifer, under the barbed-wire fence, and Edgar over it. The dog plunged at once into a dense undergrowth where there was no path. Edgar grew more and more interested. It began to be dark. The woods extended a great way, and it was lonesome and wild. They came to a ravine whose banks were high hills, and in its midst was a little brook that must have felt lost in such a great bed. Lucifer started down the steep hill and Edgar wondered if the dog meant to go right on across Missouri without stopping. So he paused, but his companion tugged at his cord and whined. Then Edgar followed down the hill. The dog reached the branch and lapped up so ne of its water, then led along its margin till at last he came to a spot where there had been Some sticks lay there half a camp-fire. burned, and there was a blackened tin can in which somebody had boiled water. Lucifer walked all about the spot, and suddenly stopped and put his nose to the ground and began to howl. Edgar tried to draw him away, but he set his four legs stiffly at angles and wouldn't budge. It was so gloomy down in the great hollow, and the dog's howl was so melancholy that Eigar wished he was back at his hotel. However, he struck a match and examined the spot where Lucifer's nose was fascinated. He sav a dark red stain upon the ground where some rocks lay piled together. It was blood. As soon as Lucifer saw that Edgar knew what was there, he was satisfied. He did not try to stay any longer, nor to go any further. If he knew any more he could not tell it. He was perfectly willing to go back to town So was Edgar. And they hurried to do so. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

HOW TO LISTEN.

We hear a great deal about the responsibility f the preacher; and indeed it is a grave respon bility to stand up and preach the gospel broadast, as a sower sows his seed. We sometimes ink in these modern days of books and news apers and magazines that the drill is to take the ace of the hand-sowing, but it is not so. By e old-fashioned foolishness of preaching will the ospel continue to be sent forth and men will ntinue to hear. The responsibility, then, is a rave one, to declare the word of life. A preacher ould not spare himself. No thought of self or ere of self should prevent the faithful delivery f his message. Dr. Munger declares that in the ulpit a preacher dies on his cross.

But little is ever said about the responsibility the hearer. How about the pew? Is there no sponsibility resting upon those who hear? The sponsibility of receiving a talent, two or five ten. Is not the receiving of ideas precisely e same? There is nothing in all this world so duable as a great idea. No amount of wealth n be balanced in the scale with a great idea. , then, the important issues of life and salvaon are handed out to men and women as talents ere handed to the servants, is there no reonsibility going with the trust?

Jesus describes four ways in which men hear e message:

First, there is the hard hearer who is like the thway which served in lieu of fences between e fields of Palestine. So hard has the soil beme by the hurrying feet of this and that, so different is the heart to the reception of high d exalted conceptions that seed can find no dging place. Evil thoughts come at once like rds and devour the good as the seven lean kine Egypt.

Then there is the hearer who is like the thin im of soil over a ledge of rock. The seed easily kes root over the oven-like, hothouse-like stone, d springs up with the shallow moisture of het st rain. These are they who join the church at ery protracted meeting, or who get great thusiasm upon the advent of every new preacher, who make endless New Year's resolutions only break them, or who weep most readily on all casions. But when a bit of a trouble comes, an stacle or a difficulty, they wither like the long, llowish-white stalks on the stony ground.

The third kind is the hearer who takes into his eart both the seed and a quantity of noxious, orny thoughts in seed-form. Both of these eds spring up together. But what wheat can ep pace with a Scotch thistle? It is not long Il the passionate longing for wealth and position ad ambition and selfish desire of all the many eedy kinds choke out all high aspiration, and the ord dies. How many there are who to-day are ing from the choking of the thorns!

The fourth kind of hearer is that represented the good soil. Deep, loamy soil it is, such as n be found in every human breast, if it but be en to the truth. Not all shall be equally fruit-I. Not all are of equal capacity. But, thank od, he does not judge us by what we have not, it by what we have. It is according to our pacity to receive the seed into our hearts that a see to be held accountable.

Take heed, therefore, how ye hear! Buffalo, N. Y.

The treatment is free. You have only to write to obtain it.

Its efficacy is explained as simply as possible below.

By the new system devised by DR. T. A. SLOCUM, the great specialist in pulmonary and kindred diseases, all the requirements of the sick body are supplied by the FOUR remedies constituting his Special Treatment known as The Slocum System.

Whatever your disease, one or more of these four preparations will be of benefit to you.

According to the needs of your case, fully explained in the treatise given free with the free medicine, you may take one, or any two, or three, or all four, in combination.

A cure is certain if the simple directions are followed.

The medicines are especially adapted for those who suffer from weak lungs, coughs, sore throat, catarrh, consumption and other pulmonary troubles. But they are also of wonderful efficacy in the building of weak systems, in purifying the blood, making flesh, and restoring to weak, sallow people rich and healthy constitutions.

The many ail nents of women and delicate children are speedily relieved.

The basis of the entire system is a flesh-building, nerve and tissue renewing food.

Every invalid and sick person needs strength.

Many people get the complete system for the sake of the Emulsion, which they themselves need, and give away the other three preparations to their friends.

Triends.

The second article is a Tonic. It is good for weak, thin, dyspeptic, nervous people, for those who have no app. tit, who need bracing up.

Thousands take only the Emulsion and the Tonic.

The third preparation is a medicinal healing jelly, in a petent, co lapsible (zojell nasal tube. It cures catarrh. It heals all irritation of the nose, throat and mucous membranes. It gives immediate relief. It is also a dainty application for sore lips, rough skin, etc.

BARTIMAEUS HEALED.*

The Perean ministry of Jesus was now closed. The time drew near when he was to fulfil his mission, as the Messiah, by suffering on the cross for the sine of men. Jesus therefore turned his face toward Jerusalem, and his disciples followed him with "melancholy step and slow," feeling already the shadow of his cross and tomb, Luke tells us that "they were amazed, and they that followed were afraid." Well might they be, for the Master told them plainly of his approaching humiliation and death. "The Son of Man shall be delivered unto the chief priests and scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him unto the Gentiles: and they shall mock him, and shall spit upon him, and shall scourge him, and shall kill him; and after three days he shall ise again." But the depression caused by this picture of suffering soon passed out of the minds of some of the disciples. They could not understand that the Christ must reach his throne by the way of the cross. From their bewilderment over the Savior's words they at last turn in hopeless effort to see the brighter prospect of power and glory; and soon their carnal ambition asserts itself again. They renew the controversy over the question as to who shall have precedence in the kingdom he is about to establish. This time James and John the sons of Zebedee, whose impetuous spirit and fiery eloquence had won for them the title "sons of thunder," had an auxiliary in their mother, Salome, who added her petition to their own, that they should be granted places of honor beside the throne of their king. If, as is commonly believed. Salome was a sister of the mother of Jesus, this close relation to him of the two disciples might partly excuse what would otherwise look like unadulterated selfishness. To their request the Master responds by asking them if they are prepared to share with him the sorrows that wait in the path of saving love. When they confidently assure him that they are ready for the test. he tells them they shall fulfil their pledge of suffering, but the honor they seek can only be bestowed upon those for whom it is prepared—that is, those whose true and faithful service marks them as worthy of the reward of righteousness. In his kingdom, honors flow out of service; the chief among them will be he who most humbly and effectively ministers to his brethren. "For the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many."

Crossing the Jordan, Jesus and his disciples, attended by a multitude of people, came to Jericho, a city of some note in the history of Israel, and not without importance in Jesus' day, though now in ruins, and even its exact site uncertain. It was one of the Levitical cities, set apart for the residence of the priests and Levites, many of whom had their homes within its walls. But one incident of our Lord's short stay in this city is g ven by the Evangelists, and that will be studied next Lord's day, in Luke's story of Zacchaeus the publican. The incident of to day's lesson occurred outside the walls of the city, either as Jesus entered or departed. Luke says the former, but Matthew and Mark the latter. We prefer to follow the account of the two, deeming it less likely that they erred in this small detail, which, of course, is of no special importance, and in no way affects the general integrity of the narrative.

As Jesus passed out from the city gates, followed by "a great number of people," there sat by the highway two blind beggars, seeking alms from the passers by. Only one of them seems to have become known personally by the disciples, and hence Mark and Luke mention him alone. Long before they penned their narratives the oth er one had been lost sight of, while the son of Timaers was probably well known by many of the Lord's followers. Blindness is one of the most common forms of affliction in Palestine and the surrounding countries. While in Northern Europe the blind comprise one in a thousand of the population, in Egypt they are ten times as numerous, being one in every hundred. There are natural and easily unders ood causes for this. The blazing sun, reflected from the white sands and the chalky cliffs, the sharp changes of tempera ture between day and night, the common lack of sanitary precautions, and the filthy habits of the people are sufficient explanation. The almost entire lack of skilful medical treatment forbids the recovery of the larger number of those whose eyes become seriously affected. To the dreadful affliction of blindness, whereby so much of the pleasure of human life was utterly deni d them, was a ded the condition of beggary. The world had not yet learned to recognize the claim of weakness upon strength, and the blind, the lame and the leper had to live as best they could upon the meagre charity of the passing crowd.

Bartimaeus inquired the meaning of the crowd, the noise of whose coming had been caught from afar by his quickened sense of hearing. He was told that Jesus of Nazareth was passing by. Instantly he was aroused and quivering with excitement. He had heard of the gracious works of Jesus, and had long cherished the hope that he might some time be permitted to ask for himself the boon that had been so freely bestowed upon others. Lifting his voice above the clamor of the crowd, he cried out: "Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me!" Again and again that cry rang out upon the air, and still the crowd moved on. Those in advance stopped to chide him for the uproar he was making, and rudely bade h'm hold his peace. But he heeded them not. His heart was set on securing the blessed gift of sight, and he only cried the louder for mercy. Such a cry of need and faith the Master never heard unmoved He stood still, and commanded that the blind man be brought to him. And they who had rebuked him most sharply for his frant's appeal are now perhaps most officious in bringing him to the Savior. They say unto him, "Be of good cheer; rise, he calleth thee." O, that we, the disciples of Jesus, were more ready to go with this message to the blinded hearts and beggared spirits of the victims of sin, saying to them, "Rise, he calleth thee." He waits not for their agonizing cry, "Have mercy on me," but bid his messengers speed on the wirgs of the wind echoing his loving invitation, "Come unto me, al ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Bartimaeus threw aside bis outer garment sprang from his seat beside the road, and hastene into the presence of Jesus. "What wilt thou the I should do unto thee?" asked the Master; not be cause he knew not the d-sire of the poor man but that he might in the hearing of all expres his longing and utter his faith. "Rabb ni, that may receive my sight," the blind man an-wers Journal of the whole." And Bartimaeu, with the jour of one to whom a lost world has been restored follows the steps of the Son of Man, and, we may safely helieve, becomes his disciple When he safely believe, becomes his disciple When he called upon him as "the son of David" he mushave believed that he was the promised Messish for that was the title by which the Jews wer wont to designate their coming deliverer. Hi faith is now confirmed, and the gift o' sight be comes to him an earnest of the larger spiritus blessings to be found in the heaven sent Teache and Redeemer.

Whatever may be said of the scientific causes upon which its yearly forecasts of storm and weather are based, it is a remarkable fact that warnings of nearly every great storm, flood, cold wave and drouth, have been printed in the now famous Hicks' Almanac for many years.

The latest startling proof of this fact was the destruction of Galveston, Texas, on the very day named by Prof Hicks in his 1900 Almanac as one of disaster by storm along the guif coast.

The 1901 Almanac, by far the finest, most complete and beaut ful yet published, is now resdy, and the Christian-Evangelist has made an advantageous arrangement with the publishers of it whereby we are enabled to offer it free to the friends of this paper.

Our Object in Giving the Almanac Away is to induce as many subscribers to pay before Jan. 1st, 1901, as possible. After that date the rush in the subscription department is of large proportions and taxes us to our utmost to attend to the business expeditiously. We are very anxious, therefore, to have as many subscribers remit now as can do so, thus distributing our labors more evenly.

Remember we send Hicks' 1901 Almanac to only such Subscribers (New or Old) as Remit, as Stated Above, Before Jan. 1st, 1901.

Missouri C. W. B. M.

The first Lord's day in December is C. W. B. M. Day. One hour each year we ask and receive the privilege of telling the people of the C. W. B. M., its aims, its hopes, its needs. A good committee should be at work in securing pledges, life and annual memberships for whatever special object may have been decided upon by the auxiliary. Let many of these be secured beforehand so that distressing "wait" will not be in evidence when the appeal for pledges is made. Others may be inspired to follow these if given promptly and cheerfully. Make every minute tell. One sister writes me that her pastor does not care to give way to the woman's work even for one service. This seems hardly possible in our state. I do feel that if our preachers are approached in the right spirit every pulpit in Missouri will be open to this work for this one service.

I find that in some auxiliarles my quarterly letter is not read at the auxiliary meeting. The officer to whom it is sent forgets it, and thus the only communication practicable between the faithful workers and the secretary is lost. Dear officers, I feel I need this occasional word to those who make up the rank and file of our numbers, these dear women whom I cannot meet face to face.

All who want minutes of the state convention send for them. They cost considerable; five cents per copy will about cover cost, and if sent will be much appreciated. Our alm, 50 new auxiliaries and 1,000 new women, means that every district should organize five new auxiliaries and hold all existing ones, and every auxiliary should gain at least eight new members and lose no old ones. Can you do it? Will you?

CURRENT EVENTS.

The last session of the Fifty-sixth Congress opened at noon on Monday, December 3. We have already stated in outline the principal measures which are to be considered at this short session. It is unusual to have so many important matters to be settled within a three months' session, which will be still further shortened by the holiday recess. It has been agreed that the Philippine bill, which held the first place on the Senate calendar as unfinished business, shall be displaced by the Ship Subsidy bill, which, with the Hay-Pauncefort treaty, will be taken up immediately and discussed alternately until settled.

The President's message, which was read to Congress on Monday afternoon, contains no surprises. After some end-of-the-century considerations in regard to the growth of the United States in population and territory during the last hundred years, the place of prominence in the message is given to the Chinese trouble. A brief history of the rise of the anti-foreign feeling and its successive outbreaks is followed by a vivid narrative of the events of the past year. In his account of the outbreak of hostilities and the siege and relief of the legations, the President exhibits admirable descriptive and narrative powers. After a brief survey of the subsequent diplomatic negotiations between China and the Powers, he makes a suggestion which may not improbably contribute materially to the settlement of the trouble. Since the injury to life and property, measured by money alone, is likely to be more than China can be reasonably expected to pay and since all the Powers have declared against territorial indemnity, it is suggested that "due compensation may be made in part by increased guarantees of security for foreign rights and immunities and, most important of all, by the opening of China to the equal commerce of all the world." The suggestion of the Russian government that, if the representatives of the Powers cannot come to an agreement, the matter be left to the arbitration tribunal at the Hague, is commended.

It is significant that so large a proportion of the President's message is devoted to foreign affairs. Among the matters of this sort referred to are: the treaty of extradition with the Argentine Republic; the arrest of naturalized American citizens in Austria-Hungary for alleged evasion of military service; the Belgian proposals for the regulation of the liquor trade in Africa (in connection with which the President recommends an international agreement for the restriction of the liquor traffic with all uncivilized peoples, "especially in the Western Pacific"); postal and commercial agreements with the South American republics; the Paris Exposition; the Germany meat bill; boundary disputes with Great Britain; the Italian claim for indemnity in the Tallulah case; relations with Japan and Mexico; the general subject of international arbitration; and the new treaty with Spain. Obviously, we are no longer a hermit nation. On the other important topics of which the message treats-the Philippines, the Nicaragua canal, the reduction of the war tax, and the army bill-the declarations are in line with policies that have already been de-

The visit of the United States battleship to Smyrna evidently reminded the Turkish authorities that there was business pending between Turkey and the United States, for the Turkish minister at Washington promptly called at the State Department to ask an explanation. He was told that it was merely a "friendly visit," and no reference was made at that time to the overdue account of about $100,000 indemnity for losses to American citizens in the last Armenian massacre. The Turk is marvelously ingenuous in devising excuses for delay in a matter of this sort, but it seems that business interests are about to accomplish what diplomacy has so far failed to effect. It is reported that the Turkish government has placed with the Cramps of Philadelphia an order for a cruiser, the stipulated price of which is far enough above the cost to cover also the indemnity; and the ship-building firm is to turn over $115,000 to the State Department to be divided among the claimants. This arrangement has been ratified by the Sultan. If this makes it any easier for him to pay, or if it helps his book-keeping to keep the indemnity item from appearing in his list of expenditures, we have no cause to complain. so long as he pays. While we are blaming the Sultan, as we have a good right to, for his slowness in settling this account, it might perhaps be well to remember that Italy has an equally valid claim upon us for an indemnity of much the same sort. It is considerably more than a year since the five Italians were lynched at Tallulah, La., and, although repeated demands have been made, there has been no punishment of the guilty parties and no payment of the indemnity asked. It would strengthen our position in presenting our claims for indemnity for injuries and losses to American citizens in Turkey, China and Morocco, if we would pay what the Italian government justly demands of many

Mr. Kruger, after spending about a week in Paris making and receiving official visits, has gone on to Belgium and Holland. The cordiality of his reception in the French capital cannot be taken as a sign of the willingness of France to co-operate with other powers for intervention in behalf of the Boers, but rather as an extraordinarily convenient occasion for an outbreak of the traditional anti-British feeling which still lies very near the surface in every Frenchman. Chamber of Deputies and the French Senate passed resolutions of sympathy for Mr. Kruger and the Boers, but when Mr. Kruger broached the subject of substantial aid in a conversation with M. Delcasse, French Minister of Foreign Affairs, he received no encouragement. A still more discouraging rebuff is contained in Emperor William's refusal to grant an audience to the ex-President, and the German official and semiofficial organs, such as the Cologne Gazette, are stating definitely that Germany can have nothing to do with Mr. Kruger and his lost cause. The Dutch government has already expressed its sympathy by furnishing the "Gelderland" to transport him from Lorenzo Marques to Marseilles. But in view of the attitude of France and Germany, it is certain now, if it was not certain before, that there will be no intervention.

General Kitchener has at last been placed formally in command of the forces in South Africa with the rank of Lieutenant-General. The work before him is by no means easy, but there is a general feeling that he is the man to do it if any man can. The popular conviction is that he will be, perhaps, more effective than humane. Humanitarianism is not his specialty; he is a soldier. It is believed that he will meet the operations of the numerous small and shifty commandoes of the Boers by increasing his force of light cavalry. He is already famous for his ability to mobolize troops and mobility is above all the thing that is needed now. A few days ago De Wet, by another of his brilliant attacks, captured a British garrison of 400 men and two guns. To the casual observer this does not look like guerrilla warfare but like war on a fairly large scale. Even the fact that the South African republics have been formally annexed as British colonies will not persuade the public that the war is over and that only police service remains to be performed, so long as troops are carried off four hundred at a time.

The Porto Rican tariff may still be open to objection as a dangerous precedent, placing ia the hands of Congress powers for colonial legislation without constitutional safeguards, but, setting aside this phase of the matter, it is interesting to note what have been the actual workings of this particular piece of legislation in this special case. In a recent issue we gave the statistics showing the vast increase of trade under the new regime. The press of Porto Rico is now considering the abolition of the tarig. It will be remembered that Congress placed it in the power of the Porto Rican legislature to abolish this tariff whenever it is able to put into operation a system of local taxation to pay the expenses of government. The San Juan Daily News, of Nov. 13, speaks editorially as follows: "We have lived now for six months under the 85 per cent. preferential tariff. The question now is, is it good or bad? Has it helped or injured us? We now have the question to deal with aside and apart from politics. Its use as a campaign club is past and gone. The burden of deciding this very important question is solely upon the legislature. If the tariff is abolished it is at once evident that a more burdensome and higher rate of internal taxation must be imposed. Where and upon what shall this be levied is indeed a perplexing question. In the last six months the 15 per cent. tariff has afforded the island as much, if not more revenue than the 100 per cent. tariff. The theory 'that the way to increase revenue is by lowering the taxes' is proven to be true for Porto Rico. This revenue will be constantly increasing as our trade increases, as it is sure to do. It has helped the consumer, for it has lowered the taxes he has to pay, not only on American goods, but upon all goods that enter our market in competition with them. A tariff helps us as borrowers; it will give our securities a stand in the United States, which they could not have without a permanent revenue like the tariff revenue. The argument so often advanced in favor of a tariff tax as against other means of raising revenue, that it is easily collected, is especially forcible in Porto Rico. We would advise that the tariff is necessary, and if it were not it would still be the most convenient and logical means of raising our revenue. Let the tariff stand at 15 per cent."

Two conspicuous Democrats have given deliberate and formal expression of their views of the recent election, viz., Mr. Bryan and Senator Vest. In the December North American Review, Mr. Bryan writes an article on "The Election of 1900," in which he discusses three topics: first, what actually happened; second, the causes which produced this result and third, the influence which this election may be expected to exercise upon the future. What actually happened was, of course, a strong endorsement of the administration. The most important cause of this was, in his opinion, the prosperity which the country was enjoying quite independent of political conditions. In view of this interpretation of the cause, he does not consider that the victory was a triumph of any political principles, or that it marks the permanent defeat of the policy which he advocated. Senator Vest, in an interview on the same subject, laid much stress upon the war argument in accounting for the result; many patriotic citizens who are really opposed to the policy of expansion voted for Mr. McKinley because the demands of patriotism seemed to them to require that when the government had a war on hand, it should be supported to the end. He says further: "I think that this election demonstrates the fact that Mr. Bryan can never be President. But the Democratic party is not dependent upon the fate of any one man. It survived the death of Mr. Jefferson and it will survive the disappearance of Mr. Bryan. We have had too much populism and too much groping around for alliance with people who have no sympathy with true Democratic doctrine. Nobody can say now who will be the nominee of the party in 1904, or from what section he will come. A leader will be found at the proper time." Although Mr. Vest pooh poohs the idea of a reorganization of the party, it will be seen that he favors something which differs from it only in name; only he believes that it cannot be accomplished at present, but must work itself out gradually.

Secretary Hay has achieved an important success in the preliminary treaty with Nicaragua, which was signed on last Saturday, granting the United States the exclusive right to construct, operate and police an interoceanic canal through Nicaraguan territory. A similar concession had already been obtained from Costa Rica, so that now the diplomatic preliminaries to the building of the canal, so far as these two states are concerned, are complete. It is rumored that England has been trying to make a treaty with Nicaragua which might limit its right to grant this concession to the United States. If so, the signing of this treaty precludes the success of that plan. The existence of a possible route for a canal through Panama, aided the Secretary in securing the concession through Nicaragua, although public opinion in the United States is strongly against the Panama route. The commission, in submitting its report to the President last Saturday, did not recommend either route above the other, but stated that both of these (and no others) were feasible. The Panama route has some advantages over the route through Nicaragua and Costa Rica. Henry L. Abbott in the December A lantic Monthly states them as follows: (1) good natural harbors; as opposed to artificial harbors at the ends of the Nicaragua Canal, one of which at least can be maintained only by constant expenditure; (2) a land route less than a quarter as long, the highest level only one-half the height and requiring only half the number of locks; (3) very gentle curvatures, as contrasted with turns in the Nicaragua plan too abrupt for rapid passage: (4) less danger from earthquakes and excessive rainfall, and trouble from river currents; (5) location in a single country. It is probable that the Department will attempt to make a treaty arrangement with Colombia similar to that with Nicaragua and Costa Rica in order that the two routes may each have a chance before Congress.

Mr. Hoar, the venerable Senator from Massachusetts, in addressing the Harvard students recently, said some things which it is well for any body of young men to remember and some which it is perhaps better for them to forget. His exhortation to independence of thought and action was forcibly expressed, but lacked the reservation which that subject always needs. The proper attitude of an individual toward public opionion is neither slavish subserviency nor contemptuous indifference. It is well enough for one to learn not to fear public opinion, but not to care what people think is a different matter. "A decent respect to the opinions of mankind" is no less a virtue in a person than in a people. Mr. Hoar's admonition to the young men to "set yourselves strenuously against evil but do not go out of your way to reform," contains within itself a contradiction. How can one set himself strenuously against evil, unless he goes out of his way to reform evil conditions and stop evil influences? It is the attempt to follow such advice as this-to live an honest li but stay away from the primaries, to pay your debts but take no part in the election of honest men to govern your city, to obey the laws but make no protest against the failure of corrupt officials to execute them-it is this sort of thing which makes our problem of municipal government so difficult of solution. A man saves much trouble, to be sure, by not going out of his way to reform, but he is not setting himself strenuously against evil when he does it.

Science, like history and religion, is busy destroying the baseless superstitions which have long held the world in thrall. Scarely any one nowadays tries to cure warts by burying a knotted string and there are not many who order their undertakings according to the phases of the moon. And now the best scientists in the country are talking about the "Gulf Stream myth" as if that famous current were as unsubstantial as the historical foundations of the William Tell and Arnold Winkelried legends. Of course, no one denies that the Gulf Stream exists, but investigation has disproved the ancient theory that this warm current, flowing from the tropics up toward England and the coast of Norway, accounts for the mild climate of these countries as compared with similar latitudes elsewhere. The proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society some years ago said: "It will probably take a generation or two to eradicate the old erroneous notions of text books and popular treatises concerning the Gulf Stream;" and since the expeditions of the "Porcupine" and the "Challenger," which measured the stream, timed its velocity and took its temperature as far as they could follow it, it has been known by all who cared to avail themselves of the information, that the Gulf Stream loses itself about three hundred miles east of Newfoundland and beyond that point exercises no appreciable influence on the temperature. The Weather Monthly, a government publication, in a recent issue says: "By itself alone the Gulf Stream has as much effect on the climate of Northwestern Europe as the fly in the fable had in carrying the stage coach up the hill." The moderate temperature of Great Britain must be accounted for by the presence of currents of air rather than a current of water. Long ago, when the Panama Canal first began to be planned, some ingenuous mind with exceptional fertility of dolorous imaginings suggested that the joining of the two oceans would divert the Gulf Stream to the Pacific and that the British Isles. robbed of its warming influence, would be left as drear and uninhabitable as the coast of Greenland. Our English cousins can now rest easy with the assurance that nothing of this sort will happen, for two reasons: first, the Gulf Stream could not possibly go through the canal, since no canal would be large enough to contain one per cent. of it, and singe it could not any way climb up over the locks very well; and, second, because it would not make a particle of difference in the climate of Great Britain if the stream should bear away across the Pacific and devote its feeble energies to warming the Aleutian islands.

A GRAVE SOCIAL PROBLEM.

There are many social problems of more or less gravity which must be solved in some satisfactory way if we are to carry forward the work of Christian civilization; but the one we now have in view is that of marriage and divorce. By general consent, in this country, at least, the family or the home is the social unit, without whose influence on the side of virtue, righteousness and purity, any effort at social reform must be crippled if not defeated. It is the oldest institution among men and it has upon it the solemn sanction of divine authority, of human law and of public sentiment. It is one of the chief fountains whence must flow he healing waters which alone can remedy our social ills. Whatever, therefore, undermines, or in any way defiles, the home, is a menace to society and to civilization.

One of our daily papers announced a few days since that one hundred divorce cases came before the court in this city on a single day! This is appalling. It indicates that there is something radically wrong. The wrong is not wholly with the divorce laws, either. We must probe deeper than that to find the source of the evil. It lies in a low and unworthy conception of what marriage is, and of what it is intended to conserve. It is apparent to any one who has given any attention to the subject that thoughtless marriages and easy divorce laws are related to each other as cause and effect. That is to say, the easy divorce laws are both a cause and an effect of thoughtless and unwise marriages. They are a cause to the extent that they encourage persons to enter into such relation tentatively, knowing that they can escape the bonds of matrimony by an application to the courts; they are an effect to the extent that false marriages, yoking together persons wholly un-uited to each other in taste, temperament, character and aims, seem to make it necessary that such persons should be separated in order to their own peace and, perhaps, for the welfare of society. There can be no question but that there are many couples holding a nominal relation as husband and wife to whom it would be a species of cruelty to one or the other party, and sometimes to both, to hold them together by legal bonds. The error lies further back. They should never have been married. Whether in such cases it is allowable to grant separation with the right to marry again, is another question, into which we do not here enter.

There is no doubt great need of reform in legislation relating to marriage and divorce. Divorces are often granted on grounds which are trivial, and which should be overcome without separation. But the greater need, we can but think, is a higher conception of the marriage relation and of the qualifications for entering it and of the duties and obligations which it imposes. There should be more teaching on this subject from the pulpit and through the press.) Unfortunately in this country the tendency is to treat the subject of marriage lightly, as if it were a subject for jest and amusement. It is difficult to get young people, particularly, to think of matrimony as a subject worthy of their serious and thoughtful consideration. Perhaps there is a false delicacy, too, on the part of both the pulpit and the press in dealing with this subject. We are sure that the most effective remedy for the evils which we all recognize is to be found in teaching the young what marriage means in its divine intent, and what are the conditions by which it may prove a blessing and not a curse.

This instruction should be begun at home and the parents should be the teachers.) No opportunity should be omitted to impress upon the minds of the young the sacredness of marriage and of the family relation, and the necessity of maintaining purity of life and cultivating a high sense of honor and of un elfishness, as necessary qualifications for a happy home. Due emphasis should also be laid upon the importance of making wise choices, and of giving careful consideration and investigation as to the character and standing of those to whom they give, or from whom they receive, those attentions which look in the direction of marriage. (This instruction at home should be supplemented by the Sunday-school teacher and by the pastor of the church.)

It ought not to be necessary to say that no considerations of a mercenary character should enter into the question of marriage. And yet we fear that many parents, even, encourage their daughters to form alliances with men of questionable and even of positively bad character, simply because they possess wealth, and alas! even social prestige in spite of their moral delinquencies. The outcome of such marriages can only, of course, be disastrous. In marriage, character is everything; money is nothing. In character, however, must be included a similarity of culture, taste, and a general affinity of spirit and aims which are essential to the truest happiness in the marriage relation hour of Prayer.

What we advise and most earnestly recommend is that parents, teachers, minusters of the gospel, and all who are interested in the welfare of society, give more serious attention to the subject of marriage, and more needed instruction in relation thereto, with a view of avoiding the disruption of the home, and the multiplication of divorces. By such a course only can we protect the sacredness of the family relation and preserve unsullied this fountain of social, political and religious purity.

WHAT MUST I DO TO SAVE OTHERS?

(1 Timothy 4:15, 16; John 1:40-45)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic Dec. 12.]
CENTRAL TRUTH: We are saved ourselves in order that we may save others. "No man liveth unto himself and no man dieth unto himself."

It is one of the prime characteristics of the religion of Christ that no sooner does any one enter into the enjoyment of the new life which He gives, the new hopes which He inspires, and the blessed promises which He makes, than he experiences a strong desire that others of his fellowbeings shall share this blessing with him. Naturally this desire expresses itself first in behalf of those who are dearest to us, and in whose happiness and welfare we are most deeply concerned. It may be safely affirmed that one who has never felt the desire or impulse to extend to others the blessings of the Christian religion has never himself experienced its joy or realized its supreme blessing. The command of Christ, therefore, given to us to disciple all the nations, to preach the go pel to every creature, is in perfect harmony with the desire of every truly saved man or woman.

To his son Timothy in the gospel, Paul, having given certain instruction to him concerning the doctrine he should teach. said: "Be diligent in these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy progress may be manifest unto all. Take heed to thyself and to thy teaching. Continue in these things; for in doing this thou shalt save both thyself and them that hear thee." While this instruction is given to a preacher of the gospel, the principle it inculcates is equally applicable to all Christians. Every one, by his example, by his words, is teaching and influencing others. By seeing to it that our conduct and our utterances are in perfect harmony with the life and teaching of Christ, we not only save ourselves, but become also instruments in the hands of God for saving others. Both by what we are and by what we do and say are we influencing the lives of those with whom we come in contact. How pre-eminently true this is of parents in relation to their children, of Sunday-school teachers in relation to their pupils, and of a preacher of the gospel in relation to his flock! The admonition to "take heed to thyself and to thy teaching" is as needful to day as at any time in the past.

It is beautiful, and instructive as well, to notice how and by what means the early followers of Christ were enlisted. As soon as Andrew found out that Jesus was the Messiah, he went at once with the good news to his own brother Simon. Perhaps this was the greatest act and the most farreaching in its results that Andrew ever performed—this bringing of his brother, Simon Peter, to Christ. No sooner does Philip receive and accept the invitation to follow Christ than he proceeds to find Nathaniel, to tell him the wonderful news and to overcome his incredulity by insisting that he "come and see." There is a hint in this record of how Jesus expects His church to grow. Here is a practical illustration of the parable of the leaven in the meal.

The fact that Jesus Himself gathered audiences together and spoke to them and that His ministers in all ages have done the same does not cancel the obligation of each individual disciple to exert his influence in word and deed for the salvation of those about him. It is greatly to the detriment of the church that this hand-to-hand work has fallen so largely into disuse. Except in cases of protracted meetings this personal work is rarely ever carried on, and even in many evangelistic meetings the preacher is relied on wholly to bring men to Christ. It is easy to see what a mighty force is here unutilized in the church. The preacher who can succeed best in securing the co operation of his members with him in direct personal work in bringing the invitation of the gospel to those without, will, other things being equal, succeed best in evangelistic work.

But our obligation to assist in the saving of others does not end with our individual or personal efforts to those about us. There are multitudes of unsaved people remote from us to whom some messenger must be sent with the good news of salvation through Christ. What we cannot accomplish singly and alone can be accomplished through co-operation. This is the fundamental ground for missionary organizations the object of which is to disseminate the light of the gospel throughout the whole world. In this great enterprise laid upon the church by the risen Christ in his great commission, it is the duty and the privilege of every disciple of the Lord to participate. Let us ask ourselves these questions seriously and with honest, searching self-examination: (1) Is our life of such character as to exert a saving influence upon those with whom we come in contact? (2) Are we doing what in us lies to extend the knowledge of Christ throughout the world?

PRAYER.

We thank Thee, O Lord, that Thou hast called us into fellowship with Thyself, not only that we may be partakers of Thy life and Thy salvation, but that we may be co-workers with Thee in saving our fellowmen. We thank Thee for this honor and for the joy it brings to human hearts to be instrumental in the salvation of others. Help us, we beseech Thee, to so live and to so reflect Thy light in our lives that others may be constrained by our example to glorify Thy name. May we also realize that it is our duty and our privilege to co-operate with Thy disciples in extending Thy reign throughout all the earth. Having freely received from Thee may we freely give. And thus entering into fellowship with Thy sufferings here on earth, may we share in the glory of Thy triumphant reign, world without end. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair

The year is hastening to its close. The century will scon be dead. Is it a time for frivolity and pleasure-seeking? The time, the season, the conjunction of great events, all seem to call for thoughtfulness. Let us have a little self-examination: "What is my life? How much of it has already gone and been buried with the dead years? What of my sins? Have they also been buried in the sea of oblivion, so that 'they will be remembered against me no more forever? That depends on whether I have in heart and life turned away from them and sought forgiveness through Christ. Have I done so? If not, why do I delay? Are there not voices calling me to a better life? Are there no impending sorrows which will cast their dark shadows over my home? No storms of temptations to beat upon me? Who will be my refuge and my strength in those days of anguish and conflict? Even now is there not, in the depths of my heart, a feeling of unrest, of dissatisfaction, a hunger of soul for something which the world cannot supply? Is this not the knocking of Jesus at the door of my heart asking to be admitted? Why should I keep him out? Is he not my friend? Does he not wish me good? Did he not give his life for me? Ought he not then to be admitted into my heart to rule my life? I will open the door and let the Master in."

Perhaps something like the foregoing soliloquy is just now going on in the secret processes of the hearts of many of our readers. There are doubtless many young persons growing up in families where this paper has been a visitor for many years, who have never yet surrendered their lives to the loving Christ. There are also husbands and wives-but more of the former than of the latter-who have honored us with reading the "Easy Chair" these many years, but who for reasons known to themselves have never openly confessed Christ and identified themselves with him and with his church. All these will permit us, we are sure, to urge upon their attention, in a sort of personal way, as if we were face to face, the claims of Jesus Christ on their love and obedience. The editor can no longer, on account of the pressure of other labors, hold meetings, as he once did. to persuade people to become Christianssimply Christians. But surely he cannot be denied the privilege through these columns of pressing the invitation of the gospel upon those of his readers who have never accepted Christ as Savior and Lord. Do not, we beseech you, allow the present year to expire and the new century to open and find you outside the fold of the Good Shepherd, outside the kingdom of God, and hence unprepared for life here and hereafter.

It may be that someone whose eyes may chance to fall on this paragraph remembers a time, away back when the heart was young and tender, when he loved Christ and when he confessed Him before men and took his place on the Lord's side. But alas! the heart has grown cold, and hard, too, under the hurrying tramp of the swift-footed years that have gone over it with their burdens of care and temptation and struggle. Now all this is only a reminiscence. Since then he has gone, it may be, into a "far country." But he has never quite forgotten the prayers and advice of the godly father and mother, and some of the sweet strains of the dear old hymns come to him occasionally out of the distant past. No one who has ever tasted the sweetness of forgiveness, and has felt the thrill of filial love as he has said, "Our Father," can ever quite forget those experiences of joy and hope and aspiration. Why should not such an one arise and go to his Father, whose heart has never ceased to love him, or to mourn over his departure, that he may enjoy again the blessings and the dignity of sonship? There would be gladness in the Father's house, there would be joy among the angels in heaven, and life would once more be radiant with hope, if this resolve were made and carried out. Every one's experience tells him that that has been the happiest and most joyous period of his life in which he has walked closest to the Master. This is because man was made in the image of God and can never realize the end of his being except through fellowship with God.

But whatever may be our past or present attitude to Christ, there must be always, in all of us, the consciousness that we may live better and truer lives than we are now living. There are times when we ardently long to do this. There are moments of moral and spiritual vision, when, on some lofty height of contemplation, we seem to see ourselves in our true relation to God and to the eternal world. Earth, with all its fleeting honors, pleasures and gains, seems to fade from our view. At such moments, which are our best moments, we are conscious of a deep and yearning desire to be pure in heart and life. These moments should set the key for the music of our lives. We should always strive to be what we have desired and purposed to be in our moments of clear vision and of spiritual insight. The mind should be so steadily fixed upon the moral beauty and spiritual perfection of Christ, that His divine personality may transfigure our lives and make them like His own. This vision, however, must be accompanied by the daily effort to realize, in our relation to God and to our fellowmen, the divine ideal which we have in Christ. this way shall we most worthily fit ourselves for the duties and responsibilities of the dawning century.

BOOKS I HAVE NOT READ.

BY THE BOOKIST.

I read a good many books; always did, because I was born with a taste for books; do now, partly because it is the business of a Bookist to read books and partly because my love for them still persists, in spite of the abuse to which it has been subjected; and probably always shall, unless blindness shall drop a veil over the printed page and the emoluments of a literary career prove insufficient to furnish the financial basis for a leisurely old age and also command the services of younger eyes. "Because it is my business"-ought I not to blush to enroll that among my reasons for reading books? Certainly not. Rather do I record it gladly, for it is not only one of my reasons for reading at all, but also my best excuse for not reading many of the books which I have not read. I am not now speaking of trashy books, of those books which give no valuable information, no wider outlook upon life, no deeper insight into human character, no inspiration for better living, nor even any wholesome and honest pleasure. never been tempted (thank Heaven!) to read rubbish. But I admit with regret, which would not be unmingled with shame were it not for this excuse, that there are many good books, great books, books whose names are household words with all literary folkthat I have never had time or inclination to

It fell to my lot once to take out to dinner a blooming damsel who had evidently been forewarned by our hostess that I was l'literary." (Oh foolish and meaningless word!) Between the fish and the roast she exclaimed suddenly, and apropos of nothing in particular, so far as could see, except her own notion that I was "literary" and must be talked to as such: "Oh! Mr. Bookist, don't you think Milton's Sampson Agonistes is perfectly grand?" Perhaps I might, without undue rashness, have conceded a reasonable degree of grandeur to anything of Milton's "unsight unseen"-as we used to say when we swapped bladeless jack-knives and pointless tops in our unliterary youth-and by the exercise of even a little skill I could have turned the conversation some more familiar field. There was a time when I would have done it. But now I put the temptation behind me and said with perfect candor, "Madam, I have never read Sampson Agonistes." Perhaps I ought not to have done it, for it certainly gave her confidence in literary men a serious jolt. She supposed of course I had read everything, and the next time she meets a literary man she will probably assume that he has read nothing and will start in to tell him about Pickwick Papers or David Harum. Still, I couldn't help wondering how long a general conversation would thrive, even in a company of people who think themselves well-read, if Sampson Agonistes were broached without warning as the subject of discussion, or Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus, or Gibbon's Autobiography, or Pollok's Course of Time, or Thomson's Seasons. For my part I never read any of them, though I have known their names from boyhood, as almost every one else has. Very likely, now that I have made this confession, I shall feel constrained to give it the lie by reading all these when I ought to be attending to more important business. But even if I do, it will not alter the case, for there are plenty more classics unread by me which I have not included in this confession, and hence will probably never read.

I had intended to make this confession much more comprehensive (believe me, there is room for it) and tell how, to this day, most of Wordsworth remains unread by me because, in my childhood days, a teacher with a genius for the inappropriate tried to cram "The Excursion" down my throat instead of tempting me with "Daffodils" or something of that sort. But perhaps this is enough confession for once. If I make any more I shall be in danger of becoming vain-glorious over my humility. But this is enough for the purpose, if it serves as an encouragement to those who feel ashamed and discredited when anyone mentions a book they have not read, and if it is an effective exhortation to honesty for those who are tempted to pretend to a wider knowledge of literature than they possess. It is a shame not to have read any great books, but it is no disgrace not to have read every great book.

Questions and Answers.

Believing good government to be a most essential factor in Christianizing a nation, I would respectfully ask your opinion touching the platforms of the two great political parties in this country?

James Hammond.

It is, perhaps, well that this question comes up for attention after the election. We are free to say that neither of the platforms referred to seems to us to touch some of the most vital issues before the American people, while both of them seek to make issues where there are none, or none of great importance. The remedy for this is in creating a better political conscience among the people of the United States, and this can only be done through the extension of the kingdom of Christ, and by making its influence felt in all the departments of life.

Dr. Lyman Abbott in his book, "The Evolution of Christianity," page 145, makes the following statement: "The scribe who would follow him provided he might first go back to his home to bury his father or bid his kinsfolk good-bye; the ruler of the synagogue who would join him provided he might still keep the control and administration of his own wealth; the Nicodemus, master in Israel, who was interested in his teachings but thought himself in no need of a new life, were rejected." Was Nicodemus rejected? Did he not become a disciple toward the close of the ministry of Christ? Please explain this and oblige a searcher after truth. John J. Higgs.

Nicodemus was "rejected" on the basis on which he seemed to have offered himself, namely on his Jewish blood. Christ's reply to him indicates clearly such reliance on the part of the Rabbi. This rejection of the ruler of the synagogue on the basis of blood, led him probably to that further investigation which resulted in his becoming later at least a secret disciple of the Master.

In the Revised Version, why is the word given "Holy Spirit" in Luke 11:13, and "Holy Ghost" in Acts 2:38? Is there a difference in the original word, and if there is, is there, can there be any distinction?

There is no difference in the original Greek word, and no good reason so far as we are able to see why the word should not be rendered alike in all passages where it occurs. This is done in the American Revised Bible. The word ghost meant guest, originally, and it may be that it was with reference to this meaning that it was preferred by the English revisers in the passages where it occurs; but the American revisers seem to us right in insisting on a uniform rendering.

- 1. Ought a Christian to take any part in the Civil Government, aside from paying his taxes and praying for the rulers?
- 2. May a Christian pray to God to destroy the liguor traffic and at the same time vote for a political party which he knows will protect and perpetuate the destructive and devilish business?
- 3. How is it Christian to exclude a liquor seller from the church and also Christian to vote for a political party which legalizes the liquor-seller's business?
- 4. Is not such a voter the proprietor of the saloon and the saloon keeper his Agent?

L. A. Cutler.

- 1. Yes; he ought to obey the laws, help to enforce them and vote intelligently and conscientiously.
- 2. Many Christians do vote for parties that are not pledged to the destruction of the saloon. They do not regard themselves in such cases as voting for the saloon, but on other issues. We may regard their course as inconsistent, but must not condemn them for seeing their duty differently from what we do. In a direct issue with the saloon they would probably vote against it.
- 3. Political parties are imperfect instruments for accomplishing certain necessary ends of government. It is one thing to vote with one of these parties as the best instrument perhaps that can be used at present, and quite another thing to endorse all it does or to engage in every business it tolerates.
- 4. We do not think this is exactly a fair way of putting it. Many a man feels it his duty to vote for his party on issues which he feels will be decided by the election, who despises the saloon business. We may think him mistaken, and both our querist and the editor of this paper pursue a different course; but we may not, in charity, class all other kinds of voters with saloon keepers or proprietors. We do not yield to any one in our feeling of antipathy to the liquor traffic. But we do not believe it can be destroyed by a policy that is uncharitable and unjust to a large body of Christian voters. In this we are sure our esteemed brother must agree with us.

STEREOPERFUNCTY AND WHAT TO DO WITH IT.

W. T. MOORE.

All history justifies the conclusion that extremes beget extremes. Cowper's statement that "man, desultory man, is studious of change and fond of novelty," is no doubt perfectly true. Very many persons are never so happy as when they are in pursuit of something new. The Athenians of old were not peculiar in this respect. In these modern days we find much that compels us to believe that there is a constant tendency to the extreme of novelty with a great many people. At the same time, it is equally true that there is another tendency directly opposed to the one just mentioned, and which operates upon the love of novelty very much as the centripetal force restrains the centrifugal in nature. I refer to what I have named stereoperfuncty.

This word has not yet found its way into the dictionaries, but what it fitly represents has long held dominion in all the spheres of human life. In our church life reign is sometimes extremely oppressive. It represents fixity in excess and definiteness to exaggeration. It stands for what some people call consistency, but which is nothing more than unwillingness to yield to the necessary conditions of human progress. It is often called conscientiousness, when, in reality, it is nothing but pure "cussedness." Doubtless consistency is all right when it measures conduct by a divine standard, but when we constantly seek to make our actions of to-day correspond with those of yesterday, we at once bar the possibility of all progress worthy of the name. We are simply illustrating stereoperfuncty, and nothing else.

We see this illustrated in party politics. Men often vote their party ticket, no matter whether they like the platform and candidates or not. They must not scratch their ticket, for if they did they would no longer be consistent with their past record. In this way they measure the duty of today by what they did yesterday, and this makes every yesterday practically a despot, ruling with imperious sway all the actions of the present. Nothing could be more fatal to real growth than this foolish notion about consistency. Real consistency consists in harmonizing every day's conduct with the truth, as it is seen and understood as each day passes. Hence no one can tell, or ought to even try to tell, what he will do to-morrow in a given case.

Every to-morrow should take care of itself with respect to good as well as evil; for the moment we begin to plan definitely and positively the work of to-morrow, that moment we make even the present a stereotyped despotism.

In our religious life stereoperfuncty work; untold evils. In fact, there is nothing else which stands so much in the way of real development. 'Once in grace, always in grace," finds an illustration in more places than in controversial theology. This phrase is only another way of stating what I mean by stereoperfuncty. We have only to examine carefully the practical workings of many churches to see the ruin which is wrought by the despot whose reign we are considering.

Much of our church life is thoroughly dominated by stereoperfuncty. The of the service is definitely and must be carried out to the letter, no matter what becomes of the spirit of service. There must be just so many songs song, so much Scripture read, the announcements made, prayers offered and sermon preached, all exactly within the time and at the place prescribed by the imperious law of order which prevails. Indeed, if the service cannot be made to fit the time of the clock, the clock must be altered to suit the service. In some way or other everything must correspond, and this seems to be necessary in order to the happiness of the worshipers.

Recently our conventions are becoming subject to the tyrant, stereoperfuncty. Everything is regulated by a schedule, and usually this crowds more into the time allotted than is possible for mortals to realize. All the same, the rule must prevail. It would be an unpardonable sin if someone who has something to say should say it while the stereotyped program is being carried out. In this way our Conventions are rapidly drifting into a sort of pneumatic-tube-system through which business, speech-making and everything else are dispatched according to the pressure of time arranged in the program.

Now, I am not unreasonable. I believe that some kind of order is necessary in order to do business in a practical way. But is it not possible to have too much order, especially stereotyped order? gentleman once came into my office and insisted upon putting things in order, as he called it. I told him to do so to his heart's content. He spent about an hour in arranging everything according to his notions. After he had finished it was with great difficulty that I could find anything I wanted. I told him that if he had had the placing of the stars in the firmament, he would doubtless have put them in squares, parallelograms and other mathematical figures. He said he was con plimented by my estimate of his precise notions of order. Nor must he be regarded as standing alone in this respect. There are many people who cannot do business at all if it is not done according to some stereotyped rule. But the man of true genius works without rule, or rather works above all rules, for only in such a sphere is there liberty to work to the best advantage. He makes achievement his rule. He does not stand on the order of working, but works. In a convention he has little or no use for Cushing's manual or any other manual. He does not believe in spending an hour in discussing a point of order when the main business of the convention must finally be disposed of in five minutes. He prefers to give the hour to the discussion of the business and the five minutes to the matter of order, if this matter must be considered at

We now begin to see what must be done with stereoperfuncty. It must be smashed. No matter at what cost, the thing must be killed outright. This does not involve the destruction of any order that is really necessary. It simply means the dethroning of that despot which hinders freedom of expression and investigation.

Everything that is legitimate will still remain; but stereoperfuncty will die the death of the wicked; and the death of this tyrant will bring new life and vigor into our church life everywhere, and inspire new hopes with respect to the salvation of the world. In our methods of worship we often need the courage of audacity, in order to break the fetters that bind us. course it is not meant by this that should do anything that is necessarily disorderly or contrary to any method that is right and has proved to be efficient. is really meant, is a plea for a freedom which will honor the mind and heart, while at the same time it encourages and provides for the highest degree of usefulness. It simply means that stereoperfuncty shall no longer sway our religious life.

THE GEORGIA CONVENTION.

J. S. LAMAR.

I tell you the old state is waking up. We have never had so good a convention. No state has ever had a better. The brethren in Augusta literally spread themselves. They entertained us royally, feasting us on the fat of the land and doing it with a gracious cordiality and freeness that made me feel proud of them-proud and happy that I once lived with them and was one of them. The two pastors, A. B. Phillips, of the First Church, and W. A. Chastain, of the Second, had neglected not one single detail of the preparations. Everything had been thought of, and everything was just as it should have been. The program, too, had been carefully considered and was most excellent, and admirably was it carried out. It contained one feature that was novel and that I must commend to all future conventions—a really good soporific address on the opening night! As my eminent qualifications as a specialist in the treatment of insomnia were well known, I was of course appointed to the responsible office; and if I do say it myself, I doubt if the place could have been better filled. The speech was discreetly constructed so as to read like a continual buzz buzz, and in the delivery to sound like an endless crooning. Any two or three paragraphs of the address, taken at random, will put any man into a sound and refreshing sleep, with pleasant dreams that something is being said, he hardly knows what. The speech is warranted to produce its legitimate effect. This is mentioned here because Bro. Garrison, who knows by happy experience its somnolent power, insists that the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST shall get a good nap or two from it; and I have promised that he may have it if he will allow me take out any bird-song or other awakening note that may have inadvertently crept in. Besides, the thing must be shortened somehow for fear the readers never would wake up. But to return to the convention. That first night's sleep did the business. I never saw a more wide-awake, enthusiastic, harmonious and happy-hearted meeting anywhere. The women's societies made a fine showing, as they always do, and planned for great things in the future. Bro. H. C. Combs, the state evangelist, made a most gratifying report; and all the departments of our work were daly reported and thoughtfully considered. Nothing in all the proceedings was more inspiring than two papers, one by Miss Ella Mitchell and the other by Mrs. B. O. Miller, read before the W. S. G. M., on the establishment of industrial schools in the mountain region of Georgia. touched the heart-chord of the whole convention, and was warmly and generously indorsed and fostered.

The committee had been fortunate in securing the very best speakers. Bro. B. L. Smith, who is always good, surpassed himself on Wednesday-the effect, perhaps, of the sleep I had given him the night before. Bro. C. P. Williamson, whom everybody knows and everybody loves, and loves to hear, rose to his old-time fervency and power in the splendid sermon which he gave us on Thursday. Then at night came Bro. J. H. Garrison. Splendid is no word for it. He never preached so well in his life. He had come to us a personal stranger to the people. We had all taken him into our hearts, and he knew how we honored and loved him. He had rested from his travel; and had breathed the sweet spirit that prevailed among usand, like everybody else there, he had had the good of my infallible soporific, and he felt fresh and strong and happy. If anybody wants to know what good preaching iswhat a grand, uplifting, soul-inspiring preacher J. H. Garrison at his best is, place him in the best conditions and circumstances, and just listen, and be enraptured. God bless him for coming to us.

Then the returned missionaries, Bro. Meigs, of China, and Bro. Stevens, of Japan, were most happy, entertaining and instructive and filled us to the very brim with the missionary spirit. We thank them for coming. and bringing us the light of their experience, and pouring into our hearts some of the fulness of their ardor and enthusiasm. And what shall I say of our "little mother," the dear, sweet, gracious and loving Miss Bessie Farrar, from India? Her simple little stories and incidents, so simply told and so artless, go right to your heart, and before you know it you are just living in far off India and working with her, and sympathizing with her and praying for her, and crying and crying. You cannot help it-and you are more of a missionary than you ever were. May the Lord bless the little darling, and continue to make her a blessing wherever she goes.

At length we reached Friday night and the closing service of the convention—a convention that had been instilling enthusiasm into us until we could hardly hold any more, and by a happy inspiration Bro. W. F. Watkins, of Savannah, had selected Enthusiasm as his subject. Bro. Watkins is a new man to us in Georgia and very few of us had heard him. And now I am almost afraid to speak of him, lest some of the big churches off yonder who do not need him as much as we do will want to get him away from us. I wish it understood that Bro. Watkins is now a Georgian. He is identified with us, and is not to be taken away from us. With this understood. I am free to state that he is a masterly preacher. He has all the qualifications-learning, eloquence, elegance, piety and a soul on fire with enthusiasm for Christ and his cause. I shall not pretend to characterize his sermon on Enthusiasm. It was better than I had ever heard, better than I had ever thought of even in those hours of warm enthusiasm and inspiration which sometimes come to even the dullest of us. It was the blessed close of a most blessed meet-

I wanted to say something of our bright and brainy young men, zealous, self-sacrificing and devoted, the j y and the hope of our churches. But the light of such men cannot be hidden. The names of R. Lord Cave, E. L. Shelnutt, W. A. Chastain, (the president of the convention); J. W. Moody, H. C. Combs, J. H. Wood, M. F. Harmon, the Spiegels, Rowland, Jenson and others are already enrolled in our front ranks and will in good time be known far and wide.

This imperfect report would be inexcusably in complete if it failed to record the deep-felt obligation of the convention to the choir of the First Christian Church, one of the best in the state, one of the best in any state. Their music was a source of thrilling pleasure to us all, an inspiration and a benediction. May God bless them all.

A NOTABLE PASTORATE.

BY EDWARD B. BAGBY.

The celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of F. D. Power's pastorate at the Vermont Avenue Church has been the event of surpassing interest with us this fall.

One Sunday in Septembe, 1875, a cadaverous-looking young professor from Bethany College stood in the pull it of a small frame meeting house in this city and preached from the text, "What is truth?" This was the beginning of one of the longest and most fruitful pastorates in the annals of our people.

Brother Power entered upon his work with a full appreciation of its difficulties. Their house of worship was contemptuously called "the little Campbellite sharty." On one occasion the newspapers referred to it as "the little colored church on Vermont avenue." The members were few in number and poor. Judge Jeremy Black had predicted that if Brother Power accepted the call he would starve. A dozen men who had been called had declined. Serious dissensions existed among the members, but Brother Power had not entered the ministry for revenue and had unbounded faith in God and the brethren.

At the time of his graduation he had declined an offer of $1,200 from a city church and consented to s rve three country congregations at the modest salary of $500. He says, "I was poor, much in debt, without books. I never regretted my choice. Three years later I married. I borrowed the money which I paid the preacher—and I paid him well—and I went in debt for the wedding suit. I never regretted that either."

The young pastor was fortunate in having as a nucleus some of the noblest people on earth. "I look over my first visiting list," says Brother P., "and happy pictures rise before me. Characters of marvelous beauty throng the halls of memory. Visions of ransomed ones are revealed before the throne—heroic men, noble women, sweet children, most of whom have fu filled their mission and fallen asleep. Only a handful are left of the original flock. Three times, at least, the congregation has changed. Three times the preacher has been able to turn his barrel."

Among the most noticeable features of this pastorate has been the development of this congregation in liberality. "I early made up my mind that if I expected my church to be liberal I myself must lead them; like priest, like people." He began by giving one-tenth, then one-fifth. What propertion he gives now I cannot say, but it is more than one half, and he says he does not have so many of the luxuries of life as when his salary was $500.

Brother Power has a larger sum invested in the Ninth Street Church than any other individual. He says, by the way, it is the best investment he ever made. He leads in all offerings for mission ry and benevolent enterprises. His people refer oftenest to his gifts to the poor. The salesman who sells him clothes said to me recently: "Dr. Power buys more clothes than any minister in town. I asked him one day, 'What do you do with all the clothes you buy?" He laughed and said, 'I expect my wife gives them away."

One co'd winter day a tramp came into his study begging for money. Brother P. had no money, but noticing the thinness of the man's coat, took from the rack his own overcoat and gave him. To another importunate one he gave all the money he had and then remembered that some duty called him to the navy yard. As he had not the price of a car ticket he began a five-mile tramp through the city. On his return as a car passed he saw on board his recent beneficiary.

He was taken in once by a man who claimed to be a friend of R. M. Bishop, of Cincinnati. As an evidence of the truth of his claims he showed Brother Power the tag of his shirt, which bore the initials. "R. M. B." Learning afterwards that the man was an impostor Brother Power wrote Governor Bishop asking that in the future, for his protection, when disposing of his shirts please to cut off the tags. But our bishop's generosity has not been confined to gifts of money. During the second year of his pastorate he started a mission and gave to this enterprise freely of his time. For several years he came every week through heat and cold to cottage prayer-meetings on Capitol Hill, when the attendance would often consist of three others and sometimes a dozen. When at last the Ninth Street Church was started he encouraged his people to take membership. Some of his faithful members and best contributors he has encouraged to join the Ninth Street and Whitney Avenue Churches. It is no wonder that after such a pastorate the Vermont Avenue Church should have been thronged with people to celebrate the silver anniversary. Rarely has a minister of this city received such an ovation as was accorded Brother Power upon this occasion. Of this we shall speak more fully in our next.

Washington, D. C.

SOME MODERN OCCULT FADS.—III.

W. E. HARLOW.

When first born into this world a child is the most helpless of all God's creatures. No objective mind to speak of, no conscience, no fear of danger, no regard for the feelings of others, not even the natural instinct of the brute. Possessed only of a soul (subjective mind), a spark of the divine, which by the law of procreation has been handed down from Adam, he begins his career. Leaving out heredity and hereditary influences, he now becomes purely a creature of circumstances. He believes absolutely every statement made to him as soon as he has learned to understand, until the objective mind becomes sufficiently developed to reason by the inductive method. The objective minds of millions of human beings have never reached that state of development where they demand a verified fact as a premise from which to reason, hence the growth of Christian Science. Dr. John D. Quackenbos, formerly adjunct professor of English literature in Columbia College, speaking of Christian Science, says: "The one grain of scientific truth underlying Christian Science practice wins credence for the whole system. The Christian Science healer is a sort of spiritual broker on the floor of the celestial exchange who, always for a liberal commission, negotiates between the divine and human and loves to consider himself on equal footing with Jesus Christ. I know that some men and women, well educated in certain directions, belong to the cult, but they are not broadly educated, and I maintain that Christian Science is the voodooism of the half educated." It would seem, indeed, that in the face of reason, revelation and common sense, a person who could believe in the non-existence of matter, (which is the fundamental and basic principle of Christian Science) could by the same mental gymnastic process believe all the rest of Mrs. Eddy's vagaries. The faith required for therapeutic purposes, however, is a purely subjective faith, and is attainable upon the cessation of active opposition on the part of the objective mind. course, it is desirable to secure the concurrent faith of both minds; but it is not essential, if the patient will in good faith make the necessary auto-suggestion, either in words, or by submitting passively to the suggestions of the healer.

Christian Science furnishes a very striking example of the principle involved in the proposition that the requisite subjective faith may be acquired without the concurrence of objective belief, and even in defiance of objective reason. That system is based upon the assumption that matter has no real existence; consequently we have no bodies. and hence no disease of the body is possible. Of course, no serious argument can be adduced against such a self-evident absurdity. Nevertheless, there are two facts connected with this system which stand out in bold relief: One is that it numbers its followers by the hundred thousand; and the other is that the cures effected are of daily occurrence, and some of the most marvelous character. It seems that no greater demand could be made upon the resources of our credulity than to tell us that all that is visible or tangible to our objective senses has no real existence. And yet that is what the patient of Christian Science is invited to believe as a condition precedent to his recovery. Of course he feels at first that his intelligence is insulted, and he protests against such a palpable absurdity. But he is quieted by soothing words, and is told to get himself into a perfectly passive condition, to say nothing and to think of nothing for the time being. After a seance of this kind, lasting perhaps half an hour, the patient almost inevitably finds relief. To say that the patient is surprised, is but feebly to convey his impressions; he is confounded. The healer triumphantly asks, "What do you think of my theory now?" or, "By their fruits you shall know them." To the average mind, untrained to habits of logical reasoning, that settles the question; and Christian Science has scored a triumph and secured a follower. It has been claimed by some mental healers that faith on the part of the patient is not an essential prerequisite to successful healing. Doubtless some of the more ignorant ones believe that statement. But an observation of the methods employed by some who make this claim leads one to suppose that the statement often made to their patients that faith is unnecessarv is rather a cunning evasion of the truth for the very purpose of inspiring faith. Thus, a patient enters the sanctum of a mental healer, and begins by saying, "I understand that it is necessary that your patients have faith before they can be healed. If that is the case I never can be healed by mental treatment, for I am utterly sceptical on the subject." To which the ready reply is, "Faith is unnecessary under my system. I do not care what you believe, for I can heal you, however sceptical you may be." This is generally satisfactory to the sceptic. He brightens with hope, and submits to the treatment full of the faith that he is to be healed without faith. It is super fluous to add that by this stroke of policy the healer has inspired the patient with all the faith required, namely, the faith of his subjective mind. Passivity on the part of the patient, and confidence, coupled with constant, reiterated, positive suggestions on the part of the operator, will work wonders. The writer has cured the morphine habit, cigarette habit, lying, stealing and even worse vices by suggestion. Paralysis, rheumatism, constipation, deafness, and many other chronic diseases have given way to suggestive treatment under my own personal supervision. Suggestion has succeeded where the Christian scientists and magnetic healers have failed. By suggestion, perfect anesthesia can be produced, so that a tooth can be extracted or a finger amputated without a particle of pain. There is a limit, however, to the powers of the mind, hence the mental healer's failure is either due to lack of necessary mental conditions, or his case is beyond the power of mind to cure. Mensal adverse autosuggestion, and the adverse suggestions of others, have, killed more people than medicine ever cured. It has filled our mad houses with lunatics, and our penitentiaries with murderers and thieves. Take the best and brightest child, and tell him he is a lazy, good-for-nothing scamp, and tell it to him often enough, as if you meant it, and he will become such. Can you not see now why God ordained that by the foolishness of preaching the world should be saved, and left the evangelist as a permanent fixture in the church? The man who has a message which he believes himself, and who has the ability to hold the attention of the hearer, is the man who always succeeds. Brethren, read up on the new psychology. It will broaden your vision, and enlarge your usefulness. It will make you more charitable, and help you to account for the strange experiences of our religious neighbors; it will help you to say with the psalmist that "man is fearfully and wonderfully made."

THE CHRISTIN CONTRAST-III.

W. J. LHAMON.

THE CLAIMS OF CHRIST.

(Concluded)

But this strange and unique man, this one so thoroughly cosmopolitan far away there in his own narrow century, makes a still higher claim than that he is "the Son of Man," and attempts the more difficult problem of proving it. This "Son of Man," claims to be also "the Son of God," and side by side with the former he undertakes to convince the world of the latter. The proofs that he gives of this astonishing claim cannot be followed here; they lie open everywhere in the pages of the New Testament. Our attention is directed now simply to the claim itself.

Eliphaz was greatly horrified when Job by cursing the day of his birth seemed to impugn the wisdom of God. His horror expresses itself in a vision in which all his bones are made to shake, and the hair of his flesh stands up, and an image passes before his eyes, and the horror is deepened by silence, and out from that awful silence a voice is heard saying:

"Shall mortal man be more"just than God?
Shall a man be more pure than his Maker?
Behold he put no trust in his servants:
And his angels he charged with folly.
How much less in them that dwell in houses of clay.
Whose foundation is in the dust,
Which are crushed before the moth?"

Here in the man Jesus is one who "dwells in a house of clay;" together with the weakest of us "his foundation is in the dust;" he is a "mortal man;" yet he "makes himself equal with God," and, though he astonishes us, he does not horrify us. On the contrary many of us find ourselves hastening to the recognition of the claim and joyful in the acknowledgment of it.

That Jesus did make this claim there can be no doubt. He permitted the phrase "Son of God" to be applied to himself in a way not applicable to other men. He called God "Father" in a way from which we all shrink, saying, "I and the Father are one." Side by side with the Father he invades the realms of the dead, saying, "As the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, so the Son quickeneth whom he will." He places himself close to the Father on the throne of judgment, saying, "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." He demands from us the honor due to the Father, saying, "All men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father." He goes one step further and declares that the honor due to himself is identical with that due to God, saying, "He that honoreth not the Son honoreth not the Father who hath sent him." In precise keeping with all this he arose from the dead, saving, "All authority is given unto me in heaven and in earth."

All these are wonderful words. They are unfathomable to our reason, but our faith does not reject them. The more we meditate upon them in the presence of him who uttered them the more fitting they seem to be to him. To those who at the same time reverently gaze upon him and reverently listen to him there rises up a great harmony between the Man and his claims.

But the appeal to such as are reverent is not always possible to Christ to-day, even as it was scarcely at all possible among the people of his generation. "He came to his own and his own received him not." The rejection of him by them was due to this, namely, that these claims, which to us seem so true and transcendent, to them seemed utterly false and blasphemous. Let us try, therefore, briefly to see what such claims involved to Jesus and to the people among whom he moved.

In the first place, he must subject himself to the charge of blasphemy at their hands, and under this charge he must suffer the penalty of their law. This penalty was death. Jesus knew all this; he knew the people and the charge they would make and the penalty they would inflict. Face to face with it all he made his claims unfalteringly, and unfalteringly he suffered.

In the second place, he must attempt a life among men that shall be in keeping with this unparalleled claim of equality with God; that is, he must attempt an unparalleled and God-like career. From such high attempt he did not shrink. That he attained to a full measure of success in it, so far as our finite faculties can measure such infinite undertakings, must be in this connection simply asserted. The argument of it must be referred to the chapter on the character of Christ. Meanwhile the evidential necessity of success in such an undertaking is as clear as an axiom. Whoever cannot make his life keep pace with his claims sinks below the level of an honest man. This is more especially true if the claims are extraordinary. It is glaringly true if the claims are supernatural or divine. Think of Nero claiming to be a god! or Cæsar Borgia posing as an infallible leader in the holy of holies of the church of Christ! There comes a revulsion of soul at the mention of such monstrosities. But when Jesus claims to be the Son of God, and when we look into his character and career for the justification or the falsification of the claim-when we do this reverently (I appeal to the experience of myriads of the most intelligent and gracious people upon the earth) we invariably end our investigation upon our knees in confession, and in the waters of baptism in his great and sweet name, and at the communion table in remembrance of his broken and restored life. The claims of Jesus are transcendent; his life also is transcendent.

Now in contrast, let it be remembered that Mohammed claimed to be no more than a prophet of God, and that his life is a parody on the high prophetic standard set by Moses and Samuel and maintained by the whole line of Old Testament claimants to that high office down to the time of Zacharias and John the Baptist. There are no claims of Mohammed that can compare with the claims of Jesus. The aspiration for universality is not in his soul, and the stamp of it is not on his character. He has no intuitional kinship with deity other than such as belongs to the whole race of men. He does not call himself "the Son of God." and it is well that he does not since his broken and distorted life would give to the world credentials against rather than for such a claim. It is growing more difficult with each decade for Mohammed to maintain his assumed place as a prophet of God, not to speak of higher claims. When he became a soldier he ceased to be a teacher and thus abdicated the high office of the heralding of truth for the low office of the conquering of kingdoms. Such prophetic vision as he had was prostituted at the last to the licensing of his own lust and the furthering of his ambition. It was a sad day for Mohammed when the Koran was translated and brought into contrast with the New Testament, for the crudity and the cruelty of the former is put to shame by the refinement and gentleness, the long-suffering and forgiveness of the latter.

As to Confucius—it has already been stated that he did not so much as claim to be a prophet, but only a historian; and that he was not a teacher of religion, but of morals and wisdom. He claimed no special kinship with God and he presumed to give no revelation from him. That Confucius is worshiped to-day is simply the mistake of an untutored and idolatrous people.

As to Buddha—how could any claim of his be at all comparable to this high claim of Christ, since he did not even so much as know whether there was such a being as we call God? Buddhism is atheistic. Buddha knew no Infinite One whom he could call Father and from whom he could receive guidance and comfort and help. His enlightenment was attained not by the way of revelation, but by meditation. By a mystical process he attained not to God or to revelation, but to illumination and exhortation. However great and good Siddartha was, and with however much admiration we may look upon him through the kindly medium of our Christian charity, he must nevertheless stand forever apart from him "who came from above and is above all." Buddha is "of the earth, he is of the earth, and speaketh of the earth." "He that came from heaven is above all."

Might Socrates be at all named in this connection? We are speaking of contrasts and surely he furnishes us a striking example. The highest that can be said of him is that he was "the Father of philosophy." It is doubtful if he would have claimed so much for himself. He had no conscious kinship with God, and did not presume to give a revelation from God. He gave to the world a method of speculation, or, let us be charitable and call it investigation. To this he was impelled, according to his own claim, by a guiding genius, a monitor, a dæmon. No higher claim than this was ever made by him, and none has ever been sought by his admirers. On the contrary some would even rob him of this slender hold upon the supernatural, and refer his humble claim to pure hallucination. At any rate, there he stands like all the others of our great ones shrouded in mists; there is this difference only, that he has "a method by the end," multitudes of men have not. But his poor method reaches out helplessly toward the infinite and the eternal, and he comes back at last from his farthest following of it with a guess upon his lips, offering that as his best legacy to his anxious disciples. Let him be called "the greatest man of the ancient world-one in whom the spirit of that world, going beyond itself, strove after a more glorious future;" still, like others of the Greeks there in proudest Athens, he built his altar to "The Unknown God," and left his people waiting long centuries for an humble Hebrew to say to them in the name of the risen Redeemer, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you."

THE BOSPORUS.

CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE.

According to promise, I begin this letter with a description of the Bosporus, meaning "Ox-ford," so named from the passage of Io, transformed into a cow. This tortuous channel, which is 19 miles long and from 800 yards to 2½ miles wide, runs between Marmora and the Black Sea, separating Europe from Asia. The water flows sometimes in one direction and again in the opposite, according to the winds, but there are also counter currents beneath the surface stream called the "devil's currents." On either side are seven promontories with their corresponding depressions opposite, the European shore presenting an almost continuous line of palaces, summer residences and villages, while on the Asiatic side they are separated by wide intervals of rich vegetation. On either side at the north end are many forts with heavy guns. The surface has only been frozen over seventeen times in fourteen centuries, the last time was in February, 1755. No less than twenty kinds of fish are marketed from its waters, besides lobsters, prawns, mussels and oysters. All fish brought to the market pays tithe to the government, and it might be well to add here that, while the taxes of the empire are not oppressively heavy, the mode of collecting by he tithe system gives rise to great abuses, the people in every case paying half as much again as the tax. Bro. Chapman accompanied us on our trip up the Bosporus and the first place on the European side was Kabatash, meaning rough stone, a place mentioned by Dionysius. Here also Tourus, the Sycleian, while on his way to Crete, anchored with his fifty-The imperial stables are oared vessels. located here, also the ornamented gate through which imperial guests embark or disempark. Also the Palace of Dolmabaghcheh with its most beautiful gardens all enclosed within a high wall and reserved for the use of the ladies of the harem. From this palace Sultan Abdul Aziz, after his dethronement in May, 1876, was carried away with his family of fifty two boatloads of wives first to the Seraglio, then to Cheragan Palace, where he is said to have ended his life on June 13, by opening an artery, but was murdered thus by conspirators. The second stop was nearby at Beshiktash, meaning cradle stone, where the Venerian fleet, under Dondola, landed and besieged the city in 1203. It was at this point that Mohammed II landed eighty galleys of fifty and thirty oars, and transported them overland to the upper end of the Gold n Horn and astonished the besieged, whose harbor was protected by a large double chair, by appearing in their rear at the weakest point in the wall. Cannon, catapult and battering-ram were used together. The city fell, the Ottoman rose over the Roman remnant, the rescent supplanted the cross and the light of God went out. "When the light that is within thee is darkness, how great is that darkness." Here also is Cheragan Palace, where the deposed Saltan Murad 5th is imprisoned and where Abdul Aziz was assassinated

At Bebek, the sixth place we stopped, is a large British and American community. On a bill, 300 feet above the Bosporus, is located Robert College, an American institution found d by C. Robert, of New York, in 1863. We visited Pres. Washburn and were shown through the five story main building, with its library, museum, class rooms and halls, by Vice president Dr. Albert L. Long, who was one of the pioneer mi sionaries to Bulgaria and the first to translate the Bible into their language. The college has an endowment of $250 000. It is an interdenominational school, with a capacity for 285 students, and is crowded. A second building has been begun after waiting two years for the "irede" (permission) from the Tarkish government with its everlasting "vis inertiæ." The instruction is in English. The college confers the degree of A. B., and is affiliated with the State University of New York. Many nationalities and religions are represented in the student body, and the college has exercised a marked influence in this part of the Orient. Cyrus Hamlin, to whom should be attributed the honor of establishing the school, says its origin and history hang on two very small events-the baking of good bread and the crying of a child. During the Crimean war, when the British soldiers were being poorly fed on the universal stale bread of Turkey, Cyrus Hamlin established a bakery and did his best at baking and furnishing good bread. Mr. Robert, visiting here, asked where that bread was purchased, hantel up the baker, found him interested in the social and educational problems of Turkey, but greatly discouraged. Mr. Robert offered the endowment, to which many friends have since added, and Mr. Hamlin began his efforts to secure a permit from the government for the establishing of the school. Day after day, week in and week out, he made his fruitless efforts, when finally Admiral Farragut's flagship cast anchor in the Golden Horn and Mr. Hamlin's boy began teasing to go on b ard. His wish not being granted he began crying and kept it up un il Mr. H. and the son went on board, where he met the admiral, and in a conversation told of his difficulty. Admiral Farragut made no response, but at a reception given in his honor that night he asked an official what objection they had to granting the "irede" (permit). He said that there was no objection and as the Turks were much perplexed to know the cause of his visit, it was granted at once. Great events again from apparently insignificant causes. Just beyond the college is the Castle of Runeklia, built by Mohammed II in 1452, just before the siege of Constantinople. It was so constructed as to form the Arabic letters of the word Muhammid. His three generals built the three towers and he compelled each of the 1,000 masons, assisted by a lime-burner, to build two yards of wall 30 feet thick. The whole was completed in three months and was mounted with enormous guns that would throw stone shot of six cwt. Immediately across the Rosporus from here we saw the "White Castle" of Prince of India fane, where Princess Irene met her Musselman lover. At Skutari we visited the American College for G rls, and were shown through the large building and invied to take a cup of the customary Turkish tea, which we heartily enjoyed. This school has a faculty of about 20 and 140 students, and is doing a fine work for the future women of Turkey. The majority of the students are Armenians. We visited also the Whirling and Howling Dervishes, of which I will write later. There are seventeen places of interest on the European shore and eleven places to visit on the Asiatic shore, but space firbids a further destription, and enough has been given to convince all that there is no place in the Orient outside of Bibla lands that can excel a day on the Bosporus.

"THE EVOLUTION THEORY."

BY EDWARD S AMES.

This book is a criticism of Dr. Lyman Abbott's Evolution of Christianity. It was written a few months before the author's death, while his emaciated body was racked by pain, yet there is no evid-nce of that suffering in these pages. The point of view of the critic is so far removed from that of Dr. Abbott that the conflict is never handto-hand. The first page bears a portrait of Professor Tholuck, under whom Prof. Bruner studied in Germany. The criticism is rather of a quarter of a century ago, and it does not sufficiently take into account the facts of modern biology nor those of the science of religion. These two sciences have greatly broadened and strengthened, while they have also modified, the statement of evolution. The appeal to the "testimony of the race from the beginning" to show tha there has been no progressive development in nature can hardly meet the needs of the critic. It is undoubtedly true that many presuppositions of the scientific theory need investigation, but 'hat is not to say that a 'vote of the people' could suffice. Prof. Ward, in his recent book, "Naturalism and Agnosticism," has given a better example. The application of evolution to the Bible leads Dr. Abbott to refer to it as "the history of the development of religious thought and life, the life of God in the soul of man." To Prof. Bruner, God was external to man and he could not understand such phrases. Such a view he says "cuts away the soul's hold upon the Bible as the source of the knowledge of God and divine things. If every man has power to know God directly and immediately, then what n-ed is there of book, preaching, priest or prophet?"

In defense of the traditional view, the religions of the heathen are reviewed to show that they do not show any advance, but rather only a degeneration from the original truths of revelation. What is recognized to day as the historical spirit and method does not appear in this survey. H athenism is held to have begun at the tower of Babel. History reveals the struggle of three great world-spirits, name ly, heathenism, Judaism and Christianity, and the last two are so absolutely opposed to the first and the last to the second, that no development is conceivable from one to the other. The last chapter is devoted to "The Divine Method," which is this: God gives man his word. If man obeys he gains spiritual life. If he disobeys he dies. Here, as throughout the book, the critic dissents from any suggestions of an identity of the life of man and God. Evolution, of course, proceeds upon the view that there is a oneness of life from the lowest to the hig sest forms, but does not on that account deny the reality or the providence of God.

Professor Bruner's book will be read with interest because it deals vigorously and fearlessly with a subject which ought to be studied carefully by all, and which is always full of interest.

B. B. TYLER'S LETTER.

"Is life worth living?" Yes! If one can live in Denver!

Denver is not "out west." Grand opera tickets were sold yesterday to the value of ten thousand dollars. The gentleman who had charge of the sale is reported to have said: "I do not consider Denver a western city at all. It is metropolitan—it is an eastern city." When a town can purchase ten thousand dollars' worth of opera tickets in a single day, and no grumbling at the prices asked, its place is assured—it is a metropolitan city!

But there is much in Denver besides the opera and the theater. There are fine churches and good schools. There is also business of almost every variety, much of it on a large scale. Let me tell you about Denver. Here are a few FACTS.

The town is one mile above the sea level. It is the capital of the state of Colorado. The guide on the "Seeing Denver" electric car will tell you that its population is 190,-000, not counting the people who are in the cemetery! The recent United States census, however, gives Denver a population of a little less than 134,000. It is forty-two years old and covers forty-four and a half square miles of territory. It has twenty blocks of eight-story business houses. The real estate transactions last year aggregated $8,000,000. Its manufacturers' ou put in '99 was more than $25,000,000. Its gold cutput at the same time was $26,508,675, and its silver $13.771,731. There are no epidemics of disease in Denver. The death rate is said to be lower than that of any other city of its size in the United States; and you must bear in mind, in connection with this statement, that sick people are brought to Denver from every part of the land. Many are fatally ill when they arrive in Denver. There are seven breweries, one hundred and sixty churches, fifty eight public schools and one hundred and fifty-five miles of street railway. Denver has the best stree'-car system that I have found in the United States. You can ride thirteen miles for a The union railroad station is built of stone and has a magnificent frontage of two blocks. Fifteen railway lines enter this depot, representing five thousand miles of railroad in the state. The county court house cost $1,400 000. The state house is one of the finest in the Union and cost more than $4,000,000. The state of Colorado is only twenty-four years old. It sometimes called "the Centennial state." It is 376 miles long and 280 miles wide. Its area is 103,000 square miles. The population is almost 600 000. The increase of population during the last ten years was thirty-one per cent. Of its fifty-six counties, forty-four have railroad facilities. Colorado has more than five million acres of farm land, and not less than nine million acres of grazing land. Four hundred and two thousand one hundred and forty-eight head of live stock were received in Denver during the last twelve months. I spent an hour at the Chamber of Commerce yesterday. I said to the secretary, when looking at mining machinery, and speaking of the rich deposits of coal and iron, and copper, and silver, and gold: "I suppose your mining industries are the chief sources of wealth in Colorado." He replied: "Oh, no; our agricultural resources are greater even than are our mineral." Three or four years ago the agricultural produc's of the state were estimated at more than $107,-000,000 in a single year. It is said that the bees of Colorado make $250,000 worth of honey annually. Denver is in fine business condition. The panic of '93 struck the town hard. It is probable that no other city in the nation suffered as did Denver in that crisis. Al nost everything came to a standstill. The year before the panic buildings of the value of $10,000,000 were erected. Building permits one year since the panic of '93 aggregated only $12,000. But all this is past. Houses are going up all over town. Money is plentiful. Denver has four national banks, whose resources are $38,514,447. The deposits aggregate more than $28 000,000. The legal rate of interest in Colorado is eight per cent., but any amount of money can be borrowed in Denver at six per cent. and, where the time is long and security satisfactory, at five.

This is enough about Denver on its material side—and Colorado.

The social life of Denver is fine. The men and women who have come to this place and who have built it up are picked persons from the east. They are men and women of education and refinement. If you want to see the "wild and wrolly," you must go to some other city than Denver, and to some other state than Colorado. A larger number of papers and periodicals are published in Colorado than are published in either Kentucky or T nnessee. There are eleven colleges in Denver. The public library has 65,000 volumns.

I said in beginning, quoting the manager of the approaching grand opera, that Denver is metropolitan. A crusade against vice under the auspices of the Anti-saloon League is about to be inau urated. Denver is what is called "a wide-open town." Saloon keepers, as usual, have but little respect for the law. Men who have been elected, or appointed, to enforce the law are quite indifferent. They do not seem to care what becomes of the law after they secure office. In this respect the police force of Denver is much like the same class of officers in other places. Dean Hart, of the Episcopal Church, started in a while ago to play the part of Bishop Potter. His especial effort was to close the play-houses on the Lord's day. D-an Hart is "a Hinglishman." He has not become a citizen of the United States. His well-meant effort, as might have been expected, came to naught. Men to the manor born, native born citizens of the United States, are at the head of the crusade to which ref rence has just been made.

There are five congregations of Disciples of Christ in Denver. They are: the Central Christian Church, of which Bruce Brown is pastor, at present meeting in a hall; the Highlands Christian Church, H. A. Davis pastor, with a good house of worship; the South Broadway Christian Church, on Ellsworth Street, near Broadway; the Berkeley Christian Church, of which Mrs. F. D. Pettit, widow of our lamented brother, Frank Pettit, is the pastor, with a comfortable house of worship; and the East Side Christian Church without a house of its own.

At a future time I will tell you about these congregations at length. My space is now full.

THE ELIJAHS AND THE ELI-SHAS OF THE RESTORA-TION.*

BY J. S. LAMAR.

Matt 17:11.-"And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things"

1 Kings 19: 16 - "And Elisha, the son of Shapbat, of Abel meholah, shalt thou anoint to be prophet in thy room."

I congratulate you, my brethren, upon your auspicious reunion. May it bring rich blessings to you, and may the Holy Spirit of God fill your hearts.

In responding to your call for me to occupy this opening hour of your service, it shall be my object, however imperfectly my feeble power may grasp it, to enable you to see, in the light of my texte, the hand of a divine leader and guide displayed in the rise and progress of the great restoration movement of the nineteenth century—a movement in which it has been our privilege to bear some humble part, and in whose interests we are assembled in convention.

But before addressing myself to this gracious task you will properly expect me to make some reference to the occasion of the present meeting; and also to dwell for a few minutes upon the special subject, growing out of this occasion, which you have entrusted to my hands. I believe, however, that you will be glad to know that this special subject will soon be embraced in the broader field which will open before us. It is rightfully entitled to that place, and to share in its larger interests.

I.

Since your first organization as a conventionwhich was called at that time and for some years, the State Co-operation Meeting-you have numbered seven Sabbaths of years, or forty-nine years -and you enter now upon the fiftieth. The ancient Israelites would have ushered in an occasion so joyous by the blowing of trumpets throughout all their land. It has, however, been decided to proclaim our jubilee by the blowing of only one single trumpet; and, as I have been appointed to do the blowing, you will not, of course, expect the blast to be either loud or long. Indeed, if I can exhibit the start and the finish of these fifty years, it will be as much as I shall attempt, believing that you will not consider me as utterly failing if I succeed in "making both ends meet" As for the finish, I must struggle along with it as best I can, but I am enabled to make the start by the kindness of my friend and yours. Mrs. Burt O. Miller. In her forthcoming work on "The Origin and History of the Christian Churches in G orgia and S uth Car olina" she not orly rescues many valuable historical facts from threatened oblivion, but gives us a rich collection of entertaining memorabilia-all of which will be deeply interesting to the present generation of Disciples, in the states named, while to their children and remoter descerdants they will be a legacy of priceless value. I have been permitted to peruse the manuscript of this admirable production, and I find in it a d-tailed and circumstantial account of our first organization for state work in the city of Griffin, in the year 1850. This I must leave for your enjoyment when you come to read the published book. I myself was not present at that meeting, for you should know that I am not one of "the old fathers." Inasmuch, however, as I was, so to speak, married to the institution only a little while afterwards, I suppose you might class me, if you so pleased, as one of your old step-fathers.

Judged by the standard of our times that first state maeting would seem very small. It had in it a few plain preachers, without broadcloth or starch ^{*}Delivered before the Georgia State Convertion, Augusta. Nov 20, 1900, on the Jubilee anniversary of the introduction of the Reformation in that state.

-men like Nathan W. Smith and Wm. S. Fears, who knew and loved the Bible, and who cared for very little besides. There was also Dr. Daniel Hook, a portly, dignified and courteous gentleman, honored and loved by all good men. If, as I suppose, the venerable Shelton Dunning, of Savannah, was there, you may be sure that he had his New Testament under his arm, as he always had. In his case this was a sort of outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace, showing that the good book was in his head and in his heart. It showed also that he wanted to have it handy as the sword of the Spirit. And woe to the enemies of God and his truth when he suddenly drew it upon them. You m'ght always feel sure that he would put to flight "the armies of the aliens." I suppose that Doctors Elder and Dostor and Wm. T. Lowe of old Antioch in Oconee, were on band-not showy men though thoroughly honest and true. As for Atlanta, it was not then as now the center of the solar system, but the plucky little city spared us two or three delegates from her sparse population. Besides these, brethren dropped in from the Griffin church and the neighborhood, and upon the whole there was a pretty fair congregation. They had their songs and prayers and preachings. They organized in the usual way. They heard reports from the churches. They introduced resolutions and discussed them, and amended them, and finally laid them on the table, or withdrew them, or indefinitely postponed them, as wise people commonly do. But in all this they were feeling for open doors into this great empire of Georgia, and trying to find somebody to enter them with the gospel. They found him, too, and as they had already elected a treasurer, it really looked like the sun was going to rise; a bright day was coming; we might as well sing the Long Metre Doxology, and go home. What a grand thing it is to have a treasurer, even if you put no money in his hands! It reads well in the reports. The word has a sort of silvery jingle to it. And then it is so business like. Certainly the evangelists cannot hesitate to take the field. Their salaries are assured. 'Draw upon the treasurer." There need be no ifs nor ands nor nonsense about it. "Just draw upon the treasurer!" I need not tell you how the scheme worked, or who got the worst of it.

Before leaving that first convention I must mention that a number of saintly women were present-the mothers in our Israel-sweet-faced and sober. Perhaps they were already beginning to wonder as they watched the proceedings, if they could not manage such business better than the men, and do it without all this circumlocution and all these pesky parliamentary rules-do it by going straight at it, and putting a little grain of common sense into it! But we contrived in those good old times to hold the lovely critics in check by "not suffering a woman to speak in the church." Even in that archaic period, however, we might allow them to sing-on an emergency. Indeed, we had to. You should have seen Bro. Blank as he led off with the favorite hymn of those days, and still popular, Amazing grace, how sweet the sound.

After "tuning forking" for a while, which was exciting to the small boy, he began to tug at the tune, trying to "raise" it, as it was called; and, of course, with all this science and struggle, he raised it too high—so high, in fact, that no ordinary mortal could reach it. Bravely the men assailed the heights—ingloriously they retired, haffled and defeated. The sweetness of the "amazing grace" was not in issue, but "how sweet the sound" trembled in the balance. It was then that the blessed women came to the rescue, turned defeat into victory and saved the day. Sooth to say, not many of our fathers were noted singers-and little wonder, What had David been without his harp? And they had neither harp nor organ; neither tabret nor pipe; no psaltery, nor yet an instrument of ten strings. Of course it was up-hill work for them. But if they were short in singing, they were long in praying. They prayed with the simplicity and trustfulness of listle children-good, honest, earnest prayers of faith and fervency; prayed as men who lived and walked with God-who felt that he came close to them and listened to them and loved them and really attended to the voice of their supplications. Their preaching, too, was simple, earnest, direct -without vain show or pretention; with no parade of scrappy learning, no pompous clerical airs or assumed superiority. They announced no sensational subjects, they descanted on no ologies or ossities, nor yet on the subjective and the objective. They preached the word, always the word, only the word. They loved it and they believed it. They understood it only in part but they believed it all. Its deeper springs they might not reach, but they could drink refreshment from their overflow. They stumbled at no miracle, for behind all miracle was God. And they believed in God. And a half century, with all its accumulated science and learning, has brought to us no better logic, no sounder theology than this; for it is still true, as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, that, underlying all true faith, of whatever articulation or developmentdeep down below it all, as its very root and lifeis the "belief in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth."

Dear, saintly, simple-hearted fathers and mothers of the long ago! Many of them had little of the world's learning, but they were all taught of God. Often they were in sore straits, sometimes in actual want. Many were their trials, many their sorrows-sorrowing most of all that they were so strangely misunderstood, so persistently and grievously misrepresented. But whether with honor or obloquy, whether with little pay or no pay, meeting sympathy and smiles or rebuffs and frowns, they might not linger. Heralds of the Great King, they must onharbingers and prophets of the world's brightest day, of the church's richest life, they must fulfil their God-appointed mission. They finished their course with joy, and God took them. No praise nor blame can reach them more. If we recall their revered names, and write deeper in our hearts the story of their glorious deeds, it is that we may emulate their virtues; it is that we may rejoice to see that by their holy lives of faithfulness and love they reflected even here foregleamings of their eternal glory.

I have not told nor can I tell as I would the tale of their arduous toil and faithful service. But if you would see their monument, look around; compare 1900 with 1850. Judge of their deep plowing and bountiful sowing by the harvests ripening to day in every field. Listen to the glad reports of the reapers coming together here, "bringing in the sheaves." If we have shared in this good work let us encourage our hearts to still greater efforts by thinking of the glad day when "he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together."

I have but to add that a few—perhaps three or four—of the old brethren and fathers, scattered and hidden here and there in their beloved Georgia, are still spared to us. They are worn and weary and loneaome. The friends of earlier years have all crossed over and left them behind. Their own loved ones, it may be, are gone—all gone. The world, with its bounding life and diversified interests, has passed out of touch and sympathy with them. The very church of God, their lifelong joy and delight, seems to speak in unfamiliar tones, and to look strange and distant to them. Poor, desolate old mariners, tempest tossed and afflicted, their voyage is ended, but they enter not into port. Stranded between two worlds, they are at home in neither. Sad and solemn it is to be detained in that mysterious region of the unsubstantial, where the interests of time and eternity mingle in bewildering confusion; where the ideal is unsatisfying, and the real eludes the grasp. The past, with its wealth of experience, is but a fleeting shadow; it appeareth for a little while, and is gone. The present, so full of pulsing life and multiplied interests, finds entrance to the heart for a moment, but like a bird it is wary and flieth away. The future-it is beautiful as a poet's dream-but it is not here; it is the home of the heart's beloved and lost-but it cometh not, oh, it cometh not! My dearly beloved, I commend these faithful old brethren to your sympathies and your prayers. Let me find a shelter for them in your care, a home for them in your hearts.

And now I must ask, "Who hath despised the day of small things?" As I look over this convention, so strong in numbers and in faith, so united in heart and purpose, so blessed with heavenly gifts and the graces of the Divine Spirit, I can but feel that the mustard seed, planted in 1850, has become a tree, and the birds of the air are lodging in the branches thereof. Surely "the little one has become a thousand, and the small one a strong nation." This is the Lord's doing, and he hath hastened it in his time. Going out from this convention with Christ in our hearts, and exemplifying in our lives the zeal, the faithfulness and self-sacrifice of our fathers, we may indeed hope that "the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for us, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."

II

You are wondering, perhaps, what has become of Elijah and Elisha, of whom you caught a glimpse in my texts. They are not far away now; and if, with wakeful eyes, you will accompany me into the larger field of my discourse, you shall see them, followed by many more, great and small, a blessed and glorious train. We shall find them in the general proposition which I am about to submit, the terms of which you will carefully notice. It is this: That every great restoration movement, proceeding from the Divine Will and guided by the Divine Spirit, will, in its beginning and earlier stages, have its God-sent Elijahs; but sooner or later, as the movement advances, these must give place to its God-appointed

You cannot fail to see the principle of this proposition, if not its very words, in my two texts. The first, referring to the Elijah of the New Testament, says, "Elias truly shall first come and restore all things." The second, addressed to the Elijah of the Old, says, "And Elisha, the son of Shaphat of Abel-meholah, shalt thou amoint to be prophet in thy room." It should also be noted that as mere historic persons, the Elishas may appear contemporaneously with their Elijahs, or even before them; but whether they live at the same time, or a little before or after them, as logically related to their great restoring work, they will stand in the succession indicated by the texts. And not only is this foreshadowed in the language of these Scriptures, it comes out in boldest relief in the lives and works of the two typical prophets themselves, that is, in the historical Elijah and Elisha, and equally in John the Baptist and his greater Successor. And if this seems less clearly exhibited in the phenomenal restorations of the historic church, it is perhaps because we are less familiar with their rise and progress, and with the spirit and work of the master minds who, on the one hand, originated these mighty movements, and who, on the other stamped upon them their abiding character. It will require no deep reading of church history, however, for any one to recognize Martin Luther as the Elijah of the sixteenth century restoration and Philip Melancthon as its Elisha-Luther, the mighty combatant, rude, brusque, sometimes coarse, but always bold, and, whether it was the devil or the pope, always ready to fight; and Melancthon, equally earnest and true, but sweetspirited, gentle, concliatory and loving, who by his moderation and sanctified learning conducted the Protestantism of his day to its best reputation and truest life.

You will perceive also that John Wesley and his brother Charles, along with Whitefield, sustained a like relation to the movement for the restoration of scriptural ho iness which they advocated and carried forward. John was the fighter, the great controversialist and, as a consequence, the one hated, despised, misrepresented, maltreated and feared. He was ridiculed by hesottel parsons and condemned by horse-racing and licentious churchmen; they might call him the Ignatius Loyola of his times, the Jesuit of Protestantism, but with his organizing genius and administrative power he pressed right on, bravely fighting like a man for his honest convictions-and equally fearless and unyielding whether the assaults upon him came from ruffians in the street in the shape of brickbats, or from the gentlemanly Toplady and Rowland Hill in the form of logic and Scripture texts. Meantime Charles was giving character and highest spiritual worth to the movement by hiding himself away in the heart of his Lord, and breathing out his soul there in hymns of trust and love that will live through the ages. While John was, in his way, trying to argue men out of hell. Charles in his was singing them into heaven. And we may observe that the great Whitefield of like spirit, though he could not be brought to yield to John Wesley's theological arguments, could drink in the spirit of Charles Wesley's songs, and, turning them into sermons, preach the gospel of love with an eloquence and power well-nigh irresistible.

But it accords better with my immediate purpose to say that Alexander Campbell was the Elijah of our nineteenth century restoration, while his venerable father, the benign, the gracious, the tender and loving Thos. Campbell, was Its typical Elisha. When our Elijah came Protestantism had reached its lowest degree of spiritual decadence. Mr. Wesley had finished his wonderful work, and was sleeping with his fathers; but owing either to some infirmity in himself or some defect in his followers, he had failed to realize his own glorious ideal He had said in the day of his loftiest aspiration: "Would to God that all the party names and unscriptural phrases and forms which have divided the Christian world were forgot and that we might all sit down to gether at the feet of our common Master, to hear his word, to imbibe his spirit and to transcribe his life in our own." Worthy prayer! Worthy of Paul to have written, worthy of Christ to have prayed! But, alas, instead of working to the end to which it looked, he embraced and promoted the very evils which it deprecated. The result was, in lieu of one glorious church of Christ, simply another great sect, the prolific mother of many smaller ones. The great Westminster Confession of Faith, the product of England's most powerful religious intellects, collecting what was believed to be the very essence of the best theological thought from Augustine to John Calvin, and presenting it as the true foundation and constitution of the church, had proved to be divisive rather than unifying, afflicting the world with more sects and confusing the human intellect by endless hair splitting and profitless logomachles. The great Baptist family in like manner, while rejoicing in a glorious ancestry, some of whose hallowed garments diffused even yet the smell of martyr fires and martyr blood, had split into sects and parties, each claiming to be the only lawful heir of Baptist grace and Baptist glory. Nor were these divisions and subdivisions of the greater sects all. Besides these there were numberless smaller sects of doubtful parentage, and representing doctrines that were ridiculously insignificant and trivial. Each one of these parties, from the greatest to the least, from the proud and poverful mother sect to the latest born little daughter or granddaughter, each paraded itself before high heaven as the church—the church of Christ, bless you!outside of which there is ordinarily no salvation. All together they were a spectacle which it is difficult in our favored time to bring before us. They were unfraternal standing aloof in non-fellowship. They were vain and supercilious, pretentious and haughty. They were mutually suspicious, they were full of jealousy, rivalry and boasting. And withal they were intrenched in unyielding fortresses of spiritual pride and self-complacency. Surely no well-informed person, knowing the real condition, which I have but faintly depicted, will say that Elijahs were not then necessary. Surely no intelligent person will believe that the case could be remedied by any evening zephyr's gentle breath. It required some "great and strong wind that rent the mountains and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord"-some terrible earthquake that could rouse apostates and sinners from the deadly slumber of carnal security, and make them tremble in view of the judgment to come. Before, then, you conde no our Elijahs for their daring assaults which, in the light of this brighter and happier day, may seem uncalled for and harsh, I pray you consider the formidable evils that confronted them, and the fearful magnitude of the work which God had sent them to perform.

It is to be noted respecting the Elijahs of all the restorations mentioned, that, together with their co-operants and sympathizers, some of whom were themselves men of great ability-each was characterized by unfilmching courage, by icono-clastic zeal, by a controversial spirit that, when the honor of God and of truth was involved, irrepressible and by a controversial power that was almost irresistible; and that the Elishas in every case, while keeping in perfect accord with the purpose of the master-mind, drank deeper into the sweetness of the Divine Spirit, and, by their reflex influence, modified the tendency of the primal movement, and so directed it to a bapa grander and a more hallowed result. should also be observed that each of these Elijahs —whether, like the Tishbite and Mr. Wesley, through the transformation of a convulsive experience, or like Mr. Campbell, Dr. Pendleton and Isaac Errett, through the silent deepening ir them of the spiritual life, in short, whether through crisis or growth-each of them was brought before his translation into a richer fulness of the sweet gentleness and love characteristic of the Elishasas if God would give him even here a foretaste of the joys which awaited him hereafter. Campbell alone I can now speak, and I do so from personal knowledge. It was not my good fortune to be acquainted with him in the early years of his career, nor during any part of the period of his mighty and numerous conflicts; but in the early fifties I knew him intimately and well. I was a frequent visitor at his house; I sat daily at his feet; I listened weekly to his sermons; and I can testify, and am glad to leave behind my testimony, that I never knew a man, I never heard a preacher who seemed so constantly to live and so heartily to rejoice in the glory of the infinite Christ. He was more eloquent than Whitefield because his soul was attuned to a higher strain. His was not the elequence of the rhetorician's art, but the outpouring of a heart filled with the living Christ. No wonder that listening multitudes hung enraptured upon his lips as, with adoring love, he transported them from the meaner things of earth into the very splendors and glories of heaven's eternal King.

Venerable patriarch of the clean heart and the silver tongue! Faithful servant of God, and apostle of Jesus Christ! The world did not know The churches whom he lived and labored to bless did not know him. Nor will they know him until, by the grace of God, they meet him before the throne, clothed in white ralment and with palms in his hands.

But now what of the great prophet named in se text? Let me lightly touch upon a few salient the text? points of his most interesting history, selecting those which bear especially upon his profound experience of the life of God within. These should have an attraction and value of their own but they will have a peculiar interest for you as reflecting their light upon the varied experiences of all those whom God conducts, along whatever road, to the same goal. These reflected lights I leave you to improve and apply at your le sure.

Elijah, the Tishbite, of the inhabitants of Gilead, is easily the grandest an most picturesque character of ancient Isra l. Much of his history is shrouded in darkness, but we can hardly be mistaken in saying that he reached the summit of his earthly renown in the splendor of his unexampled conflict and victory at Mount Carmel. The story is well known, and need not here be rehearsed. King and courtiers with the multitudes of Israel were present, lending sympathy and support to the 450 prophets of Baal These, as honored ministers of the court, as the queen's pets and proteges, and as favorites and leaders of the people, appeared, we may feel sure, in rich attire bentting their exalted station. We may, too, imagine their gorgeous procession, marching with music and exultint shouts to the field of conflict-there to meet single man, obscure and humble, who had rarely been seen, and representing a God who had never been seen, and of whom no image or likeness had ben allowed. When the prescribed preparations had been made, they called loudly upon their god from morning till noon, and then, under the stings of Elijah's taunts, till near the time of the evening sacrifice, cutting themselves meanwhile with knives in the frenzy of despair and fear, till their robes were covered with blood—but there was neither voice nor any snswer, nor any that regarded. Their god was deaf and dead and powerless, be was no god. His prophets have had a fair trial and have failed. It is an utter, shameful, mortifying failure. And now Elijah stands forthwith not a friend to strengthen his heart, not a with not a friend to strengthen his heart, how a voice to encourage his faith. He stands a man somewhat above the average height. He is a lithe, lean, wiry mountaineer. His hair is long and hangs unkempt down his said on his loins he wears a leathern girdle, and on his shoulders a cape or mantle of common sheepskin. Evidently he relies upon no adventitious aid. He is no monarch's pampered weakling. But in his eye, as he calmly looks around, is seen the light of a deep soul-the glory of a lofty purpose; while on his brow he bears the mystic stamp with which greatness seals her own. With utmost deliberation and composure he prepares to meet the tremendous issue of the day. He repairs Jehovah's altar that had been broken down-indicative of the result at which he aimed; and he took twelve stones to represent the twelve tribes, and with these built an altar; he dug a trench about it, laid the wood in order, and put the slain bullock upon it; drenched the whole with abundant outpourings of water; and now all is ready. vast multitude stands spell bound. It is an auxious moment for king and prophets and apostate people. Elijah alone is unperturbed. Not a fear shakes his heart, not a doubt enters his soul, as, awid the hush of the great multitude and in the sublimity of an assured and matchless faith, he calmly stakes everything upon the result--his life as a man, his reputation as a prophet, his people's faith, his country's law, and the very honor of his all serenely ventured upon the answer to God. one simple, earnest prayer. In tones subdued and solemn he lifted his trustful heart to God and solemn he lifted his trustful heart to God and said: "Lord God of Abraham, Issac and of Israel, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have all these things at thy word. Hear me, O Lord, hear me, that this people may know that thou art God, and that thou hast turned their the Lord heart back again." The answer was prompt; the fire of the Lord fell as an all-consuming flame, The answer was prompt; the while the people, prostrate on their faces, cried out: The Lord he is the God; the Lord he is the God. Then, after executing the idolatrous prophets, convicted now by divine degree as guilty deceivers and rebels, he goes up the mountain and once more bows his soul in prayer. Approving heaven, so long shut up according to his word, opens to respond in refreshing and abundant rain.

CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.

Our Budget.

- -Last month of the last year of the nineteenth century.
- -Let us make the best use of the remaining days of the century.
- —A fine bill of fare is being prepared for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the first year of the twentieth century.
- -"The best is none too good for our readers" is our motto for the coming year. Onward and upward is our constant aim.
- —Nothing short of a large increase in our circulation would justify us in the outlay we are making for our volume for 1901. But the growth of our subscription list during the year now closing gives us assurance of a still larger increase the coming year.
- —We hope to be able to make at least a partial announcement next week of our plans for the coming year. Then we shall expect our friends in all parts of the country to do their part towards doubling our circulation.
- —We have always gone on the principle that our readers desire us to keep abreast of the best religious journalism of the times, for that is the kind of constituency we have appealed to. We do not believe they will disappoint us by failing to stand by us and to co operate with us in our efforts to improve the paper.
- —Do not fail to read the three prize poems on Macatawa in our Thanksgiving number and cast your vote. So far the race is close and is getting to be exciting. The time is short. Vote at once—one vote only for each reader. Polls will be closed at 6 P. M., Dec. 13th.
- —The "Special Christmas Catalogue" of the Christian Publishing Co. contains descriptive price list (illustrated) of nearly three hundred books suitable for Christmas gifts. If you have not received this catalogue, please inform us at once.
- —Christmas is rapidly approaching. It is high time our patrons were forwarding to us their orders for books. These orders should be sent as early as possible, to avoid the tremendous rush that begins about December 15.
- —We have received Vol. 1., No. 1. of the "Church Messenger," a local paper representing the congregation at Findlay, O., of which A. M. Growden is pastor. R. H. Bolton edits and publishes the paper and it is a newsy sheet.
- —We call attention to the timely and thoughtful articles by W. E. Harlow on "Psychic Phenomena." The principles which modern psychical research have brought to light cut the ground out from under a large number of modern religious fads and fancies that are in the healing business.
- —The church at Cameron, Ill., whose new house of worship was dedicated Nov. 25, by H. O. Breeden, has issued an illustrated booklet containing a historical survey of the congregation's history from its organization in 1831 down to the present pastorate of O. D. Maple, and the program of the dedicatory services.
- —A somewhat radical step was taken by the trustees of Andover Theological Seminary in permitting the inauguration of Professor E. Y. Hincks Abbot Professor of Theology without requiring him to subscribe to the creed. The trustees first referred the matter to the board of visitors, suggesting that the phraseology of the creed is ancient and unfamiliar and often misleading and the visitors agreed with the trustees that it should not be held as binding. This is the natural course of history. A creed which needs to be revised and is not revised gets itself ignored.

- —Christian Endeavor Topic Cards for 1901 are now ready—$1.00 per hundred. C. E. Societies should secure these in good season for the new year.
- —Have you received the Christian Lesson Commentary for 1901? Don't put off sending your order too long, or you will not have the book in time to prepare for the first Sunday in the new year.
- —Nov. 25 was the day appointed for the boya' and girls' rally for America, but if for any reason your school could not observe that day have your rally as soon as possible. Send all remittances to B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, O.
- —Speaking of the ministerial dead line and how not to pass it, a correspondent utters this parable: "A man who has used an axe for twenty-five years without using the grindstone will not chop much wood in a week." Books are an important part of the minister's grindstone. Therefore haec fabula docet, read good books and keep your axe sharp.
- —The fifth annual report of the Board of Ministerial Relief for the year ending Oct. 1, 1900, shows receipts for the year $6,298.15; the permanent fund, $16,907.22. It contains also much other matter, which if generally known, would stimulate the brotherhood to make a large offering on the third Sunday in December.
- —The articles on "Christ in Contrast," by W.J. Lhamon, of Allegheny, Pa., deserve, and we hope will receive, a very careful reading. At this time when Christianity stands confronting all other religions of the world, claiming to be the one universal religion for mankind, it is well to know in what respects Christ sustains a unique relation to God and to man.
- —It will be remembered that A. B. Philputt introduced a resolution in the National Convention of the Foreign Society at Kansas City, asking the secretaries to make a call for One Hundred Thousand One Dollar Volunteers for Foreign Missions this, the first year of the new century. The call is being made, and large numbers of one dollar gifts are being received daily at the office of the society. Send to F. M. Rains, Cor. Sec., Box 884, Cincinnati, O.
- —Read W. T. Moore's article on "Stereoperfuncty" and recall, in connection with what he says about the foolishness of a man's ordering his opinions to day in agreem nt with his opinions of yesterday, these words of Emerson: "Consistency is a right fool's word. Speak what you think today in words as hard as cannon balls, and speak what you think to-morrow if it contradicts every word you say to-day."
- The Christian Courier quotes from an exchange a paragraph to prove that the words neither and either should not be pronounced nither. The proof is by analogy. About fifteen words are cited in which this diphthong occurs and the long "i" sound is in only one or two of them. So far so good, but in fully a dozen it is pronounced like long "a" (e. g. feign). So, after all, if the analogy cours for anything, it is neither ni-ther nor nee-ther but nay-ther. Hurray for auld Ireland!
- —A personal note from A. L. Chapman, Missionary of the Foreign Society in Constantinople, tells us that Mr. Shishmanian has taken charge of the work among the Armenians at Levas in the interior. Brother Chapman gives most of his time to the school in Constantinople where he has three young men who look forward to the ministry. "The greatest opportunity for mission work in Turkey is in schools and orphanages where much labor is to be expended, hoping to reach the great grandchildren of the present generation."

What are Humors?

They are vitiated or morbid fluids coursing the veins and affecting the tissues. They are commonly due to defective digestion but sometimes inherited.

How do they manifest themselves?

In many forms of cutaneous eruption, salt rheum or eczema, pimples and boils, and in weakness, languor and general debility.

How are they expelled? By humors.

Hood's Sarsaparilla which also builds up the system that has suffered from them.

It is the best of all medicines for all

- —In a letter from H. A. Northcutt, he says: "I have been preaching in Sedalia two weeks. Have had twenty-three additions, most of them young men, almost all by confession." We are glad to hear of this good work in Sedalia.
- —The church at Kirksville, Missouri, is remodeling and improving its building at a cost of about $6,500 and will have the formal re-opening and dedication on December 9, the Editor of this paper preaching on the occasion.
- —The Central Christian Register, of Kansas City, publishes the following editorial staff: G. A. Hoffmann, editor, and T. H. Capp, F. W. Emerson, R. L. Wilson and J. T. Ogle, as contributing editors. It is a newsy, wide-awake sheet.
- —An irate correspondent in commenting on the outcome of the late election says, "take off the negroes' and foreigners' vote and give us a clean white vote" and the thing will be very different. Our correspondent is exactly right in wanting a clean vote, but that is not to be obtained by any such simple process as the elimination of the colored and foreign voters. The fact is if we could once get an absolutely clean vote wherein all citizens of whatever color and race would cast an honest and intelligent ballot, there would be some results which would startle the political forecasters.
- —Eva Marshall Schontz, the eloquent young lady who thrilled the National Convention at Kansas City on the subject of temperance, is to address a great mass meeting at the West End Colisem, 3218 Olive-Street, this city, Thursday evening, December 6. Her subject will be that to which she has dedicated her life—the overthrow of the saloon. Miss Schontz is National President of the Young People's Christian Temperance Union. A great chorus under the leadership of S. C. Bolt will furnish the music. It is the desire of those having charge of the arrangements to fill that great auditorium. All are invited to come and "let him that heareth say, Come."
- -Dr. George Park Fisher, who has for many years held the Titus Street professorship of ecclesiastical history in Yale Divinity School, has lately tendered his resignation. For more than forty-five years he has been connected with the faculty of Yale and for thirty-nine years he has been professor of Church History. His sound and comprehensive scholarship and his command of a literary style gave him an important position among the historical writers of this century. His Church History in one volume is the best known of his works and has for many years been considered the standard work on the subject, but those who have read none of his other books will not fully appreciate his power of writing forcible and picturesque English. Since the death of Philip Schaff, Dr. Fisher has been recognized as the foremost church historian in America, a position corresponding to that held by Harnack in Germany. In spite of his advanced age, Dr Fisher is well-preserved and much good work may yet be expected from him.

-The Union Thanksgiving service of the Christian churches of this city, last week, held at the Mt. Cabanne church, was largely attended and was pronounced one of the most successful ever held -The office of secretary of the fifth Illinois district was made vacant by the resignation and removal of Paul H. Castle, but the board has appointed R E. Thomas, of Petersburg, to fill the vacancy and he has accepted. Correspondents will please note this change.

-F. G. Tyrrell, late pastor of the First Christian Church in Chicago, and before that for eight years pastor of the Central Coristian Church in this city, has accepted a call from the Mt. Cabanne Church of this city, and will begin his regular pastoral work there as soon as he can close some engagements already made. It is a high compliment to Brother Tyrrell to be called back to a city where he is so widely known, and we congratulate both parties to the contract, and wish for the best results therefrom.

-In an editorial in the Washington Post, suggested by the 25th anniversary of Bro. Power's pastorate there, occurs the following paragraph:

When Mr. Power was called to minister to the little band of Disciples in the little frame church, Judge Black said to him: "They will starve you, young man; I know them They are not able to young man; I know them They are not able to sustain you." Referring to that admonision, Mr. Power says: "I never in my life cared for money, but it has always come to me when I needed it. Referring to that admonition, Mr. I never yet put a price upon my work as pastor, but my brethren have always dealt generously by me."

It is a fact capable of ample proof, that the ministers of the gospel, who are actuated by the most unselfish motives in their ministry, are the very men who are most likely to be "dealt generously by." The preacher who makes it apparent that the salary is the principal thing, and who always regards the offer of a higher salary as "God's call," is likely, sooner or later, to find himself without a call, even from men.

-But we believe that such a preacher is the exception, not the rule. Referring to the unselfishness of the ministry the same paper says:

There are clergymen in the District of Columbia who have refused an increase of their small salaries because most of their parishioners were poor. There are others who have remained with their flocks notwithstanding offers of much larger salaries to go elsewhere. That is the spirit which, whenever mani ested indicates the possession of the most important item in the equipment of a minister for so broadly useful a career as that of Mr. Powrr. That is the spirit which has built up some of the large churches in Washington and is building up others.

It is such a spirit as this that impresses men of the world with a respect for the ministry and for the religion they teach and illustrate.

-The following communication, received on December 1, by B. L. Smith, explains itself:

"I enclose you draft for $10,000 (ten thousand) on the anouity plan Please do not let my name be I am gesting in earnest abous saving our own people. I believe more than ever in Home

The wisdom of the Board in pushing the annuity plan is being demonstrated day by day It is such a straightforward, business like arrangement and makes it so easily possible for persons of only molerate resources to do great good without unduly impoverishing themselves, that it is bound to commend itself more and more. The friend who has thus anonymou-ly given $10 000 for missionary work is evidently "getting in earnest" on the subject, for he gives the whole sum for actual missionary work and does not expect to receive the benefit of any advertising from it. May his tribe increase.

DEAR SIRS:—"During three years I was frequently attacked with severe spells of sickness; many of these sick spells kept me in bed, danger-ously ill, from three weeks to three months, and r the constant care of the best physicians in Kansas City. City. The doctors said my kidneys were not afrecced, but I felt surs they were the cause of my troub e.

"Some doctors pronounced my case gall stones, and said I could not live without a surgical operation, to which I would never consent In May, 1898, I had the most severs attack. Then the doctors said I could not live. It was during this illness that a friend suggested I try Dr Kilmer's Swamp-Root. I began to take Swamp-Root regularly, and when I had used only three fifty-cent bottles I felt fine and was able to domore work than I had done in four years. It has made a new woman of me. I have only had one slight attack since I began to the Swamp-Root, and that was caused by being drenched with rain and catching cold. This stomach trouble had bothered me for about twenty years and had become chronic. I am now 44 years of age and feel much younger than I did ten years ago. My friends say I am lookir g younger very day. Five ears ago I only weighed 104 pounds. I now weigh 185 pounds. I freely give his testimonial for the benefit of those who have suffered as I have?"

MRS. M. E. DALLAM, Proprietress of Criswell House, 211 W. 5th St., Kansas City, Mo.

Swamp-Root will do just as much for any housewife whose back is too weak to perform her necessary work, who is always tired and overwrought. who feels that the cares of life are more than she can stand. It is a boon to the weak and ailing.

How to Find Out If You Need Swamp-Root.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorders of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood-that is their work. So when your kidneys are weak or out of order you can understand how quickly your whole body is affected and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp. Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone, -you may have a sample bottle free for the asking.

Many women suffer untold misery because the nature of their disease is not correctly understood. They are led to believe that womb trouble or female weakness of some sort is responsible for the many ills that beset womankind.

Neuralgia, nervousness, headache, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, rheumatism, a dragging pain or dull ache in the back, catarrh of the bladder, weakness, or bearing down sensation, profuse or scanty supply of urine, with strong odor, frequent desire to pass it night or day, with scalding or burning sensation, sediment in it after standing in bottle or glass for twenty-four hours-these are all unmistakable signs of bladder and kidney trouble.

Other symptoms showing that you need Swamp-Root are sleeplessness, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, plenty of ambition but no strength.

Swamp Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, and is taken by doctors, themselves, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

To prove its wonderful curative properties, send your name and address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y, when you will receive, free of all charge, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root, also a pamphlet of valuable information pertaining to kidney and bladder troubles, by mail prepaid. This book contains many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women who owe their good health, in fact their very lives, to the wonderful curative properties of this great kidney remedy. Swanp-Root is so remarkably successful that our readers are advised to write for a free sample bottle, and to be sure and mention reading this generous offor in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size battles at the drug stores everywhere.

Among Our Advertisers.

BARCLAY MEADOR, ADVERTISING MANAGER.

There was a time when an advertiser was looked upon as one who had for sale a commodity of doubtful merit. There was a suspicion that the owner or promoter was seeking by means of newspaper publicity to create an abnormal demand for the article and thereby effect a sale to an unsuspecting purchaser.

To-day it is not so. The purpose of advestising is understood. While there are a few advertisers who prey upon the cradulity of the public, the great balk of them are sincere and have meritorious articles or goods for sale.

The merchant or manufacturer who would become an advertiser casts boat to see what class of people need what he has to offer for sale. He finds that a great many people who can use his goods are realers of religious papers, hence he calls to his aid the advertising columns of such papers.

Readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST keep posted as to the advertisements which appear in its columns from week to week, but will be interested in knowing something of them from the standpoint of the Christian Publishing Co's. advertising department. Hereia is suggested the reason and the purpose for the setting aside of this column headed "Among Our Advertisers." From week to week it will contain references to our aivertisers and information of interest upon the subject of advertising.

Fillmore Bros., of Cincinnnati, may be taken as an illustration of a manufacturing establishment, which in seeking for opportunity to make known what it had for sale, sought cut the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST'S advertising columns. J. H. and Chas. M. Fillmore, as many know, are music publishers. They are members of the Christian Church and their publications are adapted to the use of our people. For some weeks they have been advertising The Praise Hymnal in our columns. of information concerning one of their publications will not fail of interest. They have just com-menced the publication of "The Chuir," which is styled "a monthly journal of choir music." Bro. Chas. M. Fillmore is the literary editor and Dr. J. B. Herbert has charge of the musical department. Sample copies are offered free on applica-

Another case in point is that of the S. S. Scranton Co, of Hartford, Conn. They used the entire back page of the beau iful cover of our Thanksgiving and Book Number to clearly set forth the offer they make of a Religious Reference Library for $6.25. This old established book pub-lishing house has the reputation of issuing excellently made books of a high character and furnishing them at an exceedingly low price. Their present offer fully sustains their reputation. The Religious Reference Library consists of the following standard works: The Jamieson, Fausset and Brown Commentary, Edersheim's Life of Christ, The Critical and Repository Bible Cyclopedia, Smith's Bible Dictionary and Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul.

The readers of a religious paper above all others need such books. The S. S. Scranton Co. recognize this fact. The response they receive to their generous offer will reveal the extent of appreciation on the part of our readers.

The destruction, by fire and explosion, of the fine hullding of the drug firm of Tarrant & Co, in New York City on October 29, directs our attention to an advertiser who has made use of our columns for a number of years. The true American pluck and enterprise which erabled them to open new offices the day after the fire, and to set open new omces the day after the fire, and to set on foot arrangements to resume the manufacture of Seltzer Aperient and their other specialties commands admiration. Consumers will not miss any of this firm's articles from the shelves of their drug store.

New York Letter.

Wherever the number of Disciple ministers in any city or community is sufficiently large, it would be well to follow the example of the Presbyterian preachers of New York, by going into a two or three days' retreat for conference and prayer. For the past three years, in the Indian summer days of November, the Presbyterian pastors of New York, under the leadership of Drs. John Balcom Shaw and Wilton Merle Smith, who got their inspiration from the Northfield Conferences, have met at "The Chestnuts" at Riverdale on the Hudson. All who attend say the most blessed results follow the gatherings. The exercises are informal to a great extent. All addresses are short. pointed and spiritual. As an example, the first evening's topie was Religious Leadersh p, at which President Hall, of Union Seminary, made the chief address based upon a study of a portion of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. In studying these Scriptures he said he would say that five elements of religious leadership had been revealed to him, viz: (1) The Great Refusal of Moses; (2) The Great Choice; (3) The Great Estimate; (4) The Great Endurance; (5) Under each and all of these, the basis of their character, which was Faith. Such, you see, is a most suggestive treatment and if properly handled would prove spiritu ally helpful to religious bodies everywhere. Preachers are so much overworked that they are in danger of becoming professional in spirit and perfunctory in service. To get away from one's work and spend a few days in conference and prayer with kindred spirits, would prove religiously inspiring. Another good thing which this "retreat" does is to schedule their churches of the city, and set apart a specific number of days in the year during which all the ministers and people are to pray for the success of the pastor and church assigned to that particular time. For instance, when Dr Smith and his people know that on Morday, Tuesday and Wednesday of this week all the Presbyterian preachers and people of the city are praying for them especially, it will have a good effect upon them. "Pray one for another."

The crusade against vice and crime started by Bishop Heary C. Potter is meeting with the sympathy and encouragement of all good people in the city of New York. Unquestionably the police department is corrupt in the extreme. This is supposed to be the case especially in the down town districts; but anyone acquainted in New York knows that the laws are vulgarly and brazenly set at neight all over the city. Saloons everywhere are doing business in flagrant violation of the Sunday laws, and policemen are either out of sight or wholly indifferent. It is interesting to see how these wicked men will bestir themselves whenever good men show a determination to expose their infamous doings. The first work of the church is that of regeneration and one of the first duties of the regenerate is that of social reformation. If the church cannot bring all men to Christ, the members of the church should exert all their power in behalf of moral decency. If Christian men would be unceasingly vigilant in the efforts to purify the politics and morals of the community in which they live our cities would not become so corrupt. It will be a sad day for us whenever the cities outnumber the country population, unless the cities are redeemed from vice and crime. Ought not religious bodies everywhere to follow the example of such men as Dr. Parkharst and Bishop Potter in an effort to cleanse the cities of the land? It is to be hoped that the Disciples of Christ will not be found lagging in this matter.

The New York State Conference of Religion which was organized in 1899 has just held its first general meeting or series of meetings in this city. Fifteen denominations are included in the membership of its general committee. Its aim is practical: seeking to combine in the strongest possible way the religious forces for the furtherance of those fundamental religious, moral and social interests which are vital to the stability of the commonwealth. The day sessions were held in the United Charities Building and the evening meetings in various churches. The leading themes were: Ethical Progress of the Century; Religion the Life of God in the Soul; Possibilities of Common Worship; Political Ideals of the Bible; Demands on a Nation Conscious of a Moral Mission; Dangerous Classes in a Republic; Religion Vital to Democracy; Religious Education in the Public Schools; Education by Church and School in Social Righteousness, etc., etc. Many of the strongest and most aggressive men in the East took part in the various sessions. Some things were said with which you very likely would not agree, but perhaps that is a strong reason that the conference will do good. I would like to commend these and kindred themes to our conferences and conventions, especially to our annual congress. It is not enough to evangelize; that is good and very necessary, but we should not neglect to teach those who have obeyed the Christ primarily. In other words the gospel of salvation should always be followed closely with the gospel of life.

The twenty-eighth anniversary of the Old Jerry McAuley mission, at 316 Water Street, was celebrated on Sunday, Nov. 25. Services were held all day, and several prominent men spoke. There is no means of calculating the great good that has been done by this mission, both in the bringing of men to Christ and in the inspiration imparted to others in establishing and maintaining similar missions. S. H. Hodley said: "The night I was converted there were 125 forgerles hanging over my head, and it was Jerry McAuley, the ex-convict and the ex-bum, that saved me." The Rev. Donald Sage Mackay made the address, in which he said, this kind of work stands for human sympathy, for the salvation of the lost and for a witness of Christ's power to redeem. The churches had tried hard to draw the people to them by eloquence, by large fine choirs, by elaborate services, by entertainments of every kind, but they all had failed. But the cry of the uplifted Christ does draw and nothing else will. In response to a general appeal sent out recently for the support of the mission, two Hebrew bankers gave quite liberally. The missions of New York are doing a great work and these faithful toilers shall have their reward-"inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ve have done it unto me." S. T. WILLIS.

Los Angeles Letter.

The winter's evangelistic work in Southern California has begun. J. H. O. Smith, recently of Chicago, has been employed by several of our churches for a winter's campaign in this land of sunshine and flowers. He is now assisting Grant K. Lewis at Pomona, preaching nightly to throngs of people. He goes next to Riverside and then will aid the writer in a meeting at the First Church, this city, assisted by the noted singer, Mrs. Princess Long. F. M. Dowling began last Lord's day in his own church in Pasadena. This is a strong team and it is expected that great good will result. The Ontario Church, led by her pastor, Loren Howe, is campaigning for Christ. with good audiences hearing the preaching of the Word. The Eighth St. Church, of this city, is in the evangelistic procession with preaching by the pastor, H. E. Ward and the writer. Already there have been some conversions. Eugene Burr and wife, of Orange, have been engaged for several weeks in evangelistic work with their home church. As may be judged from these statements, our churches have entered vigorously upon their winter's work. We never had so many preachers supported by our churches as we have now and our churches were never so prosperous and well conditioned.

We have recently had heavy rains which encourage us to expect abundant wetness for the winter. The hills and plains are rapidly robing themselves in garments of green and producing flowers of endless variety in gratitude to the Giver of all good. The hearts of the people here are full of rejoicing. Every incoming overland train is loaded with tourists who are planning to spend their winter beneath the smiles of our Italian sky rather than amid the ice and snow of less favored climes. The pen is unable to portray the joys of a winter in this glorious climate. Nor are the people of this country ignorant of the attractions of Southern California climate. Within the past ten years Los Angeles has more than doubled her population, thus surpassing the record of growth of any other city of similar size in the United States. Other towns of this section have grown with equal rapidity and this, too, in the face of the great penic of 1893 and the three most unprecedented drouths in Southern California's history. Southern California is a world beater on climate and the world is rapidly finding it out. We extend a cordial welcome to all visitors.

Chicago Letter.

The city council has appropriated $10,000 upon request of Mayor Harrison, for the employment of 121 probationary patrolmen to serve until January 1. This is part of an effort to suppress crime, or at least to check its increase. The last few weeks have witnessed unusual boldness on the part of thugs. The chief of police publicly advised the citizens to carry arms and shoot hold-up men. The officers of the law seem to think that more drastic punishment of commanded is demanded.

"I do not hesitate to say that a great part of the congregation of my church cares more for the theatre, cheap literature, and all the other allurements of sin than they do for their own church, its welfare, and the salvation of their own souls. And I believe this deplorable state of affairs exists in all parts of the city." Like a cry of distress and disappointment, these words were heard from the lips of Dr. Kittredge Wheeler, of the Fourth Baptist Church, at a recent meeting of the Baptist ministers. It may well be a question as to the extent of the evils complained of. Worldliness is the constant foe of the church, and the Christian life is a warfare. But most people, even Chicago church members, are amenable to reason, and there is hope for the rest ration of the erring and the salvation of the lost. The faithful shepherd may grieve, but his labors will not be in vain.

Last week's papers announced a new corn king on the Chicago Board of Trade, gave a sketch of his life and gauged his popularity. In speaking of his gains, one of the reporters stated that he always won from heavy speculators, who were able to stand it, and who were the only ones affected. Some of us believe that the "heavy speculators" are not the only ones affected. Wou'd that they were. Not to mention the pernicious effects of Board of Trade speculation upon public morals, it seems clear that the prices of farm products are affected, and legitimate business hurt.

There are evidences of new departures in business on every hand. Most people seem to be glad the election is over. As the Christian-Evangelist has already pointed out, a political campaign has its lessons for the chirch. J. H. O Snith calls the campaign a political revival, and the revival a religious campaign. Would it not be a good plan to bring a force of capable men to our larger cities and have ten or fifteen of them at work simultaneously? Congregations in the different parts of a city cannot be of any real help to one another; each might better be engaged in its own meeting. Then the enthusiasm and success of one would stimulate all the rest. Such a spectacle would greatly impress even a city of half a million.

Chicago city missions are undergoing a necessary process of readjustm-nt. Wm. Brooks Taylor is getting the reins well in hand before attempting any rapid driving. His successor, Thad. S. Tinsley, is being stauachly supported by the saints of the North side. Both pastor and church are deserving of commendation for the sane, quiet way in which the vacant pulpit was filled. There was not a moment's break in the succession from Taylor to Tinsley.

As soon as the new First Church locates a shepherd, we shall feel strong on the South Side. E. S. Ames is a tower of defence and an aggressive leader at Hyd. Park. The old Central cannot run down forever, and the Divinity House furnishes a group of choice preachers for the weak missions. We feel that the faithful in Chicago are entitled to the sympathy and prayers of the whole brotherhood. It is a city of uncurbed mammonism, a city of flats and tenements but no houses, a city overwhelmingly foreign in its population and full of all unrighteousness.

Christian Work Among Students.

The statistics of the Missouri State University giving the comparative strength of the several churches represented in the student body there furnish food for serious thought. The importance of church work in student centers is not felt, I am sure, by many of our people. Work with the students in Warrensburg impresses this upon me as never before. One-third of the enrollment here is from the Christian Church or from families attending that church. The graduating classes last year represented 56 counties of the state. Taese young people go out into counties where we are weak and into communities where we have no churches. They teach Sunday school classes; they even organize Sunday-schools; they become centers of influence; they are the forerunners of churches. They are the material from which shall come the best civilization of the next decade.

The duties of a church in student centers are many and heavy: In Warrensburg we try to realize this broader conception of duty. Many come into touch with us the first time while attending our services, and we feel that our order of exercises, the methods of work in the Y. P. S. C. E. and Junior become models to them. The organization and management of our Sunday-school will be reproduced in many localities. The Bible classes, teachers' meetings, committee meetings—all these are important.

It is probably not known that we have more students who are members of the Christian Church attending the State Normal here than there are attending the State Univ rsity at Columbia. We are not arguing from this that we should have Bible-chair work. We realize that students are here for special work; that their time and money are limited; that the ways above mentioned are the only ones by which we can do much for more than a small per cent. of the students.

H. A. DENTON.

The Doctor Laughed

BUT THE WOMAN WAS FRIGHTENED.

A physician of Columbus, Ga., rather poked fun at a lady patient who insisted she had heart

The trouble really was caused by injuries from the effects of coffee drinking, and the verves were so affected that it gave her every indication of heart disease. This is true of thousands of people who are badly hurt by the caffeine of coffee, and it is understood that if continued long enough real organic heart disease will set in.

The lady referred to above is Mrs. C. V. Irvin, 1010 B Street, East Highland, Columbus, Ga. She says: "I had been running down in health for a number of years and suspected that coffee was hurting me but could not get my consent to quit it. My heart troubled me so that I was very short of breath, and could do little or nothing that required exertion. I had fearful nervous headaches nearly every day, and was exceedingly nervous with indigestion and badly constipated. The doctor laughed at my idea of heart trouble, but knew that I was in a serious condition generally Finally I was induced to quit coffee and take up Postum F od Coffee. This was about four months ago and the change has been wonderful. I feel like another person. My heart does not trouble me at all, and the stomach and nerves are decidedly improved. My head does not give me the old trouble it did, while the bowels are regular without any purgatives or medicine of any kind.

"I can hardly express my gratification for the relief from suffering brought on by the use of regular coffee, and I cannot thank Postum enough."

Ministerial Relief-A Suggestion.

I have been wondering if a better day than the third Lord's day in December could not be found on which to take the offering for this holy and tender ministry. December is the month for the payment of taxes; for the clesing up of the year's work in many churches and the raising of money to meet deficits in current expenses; for the unusual outlay of the people for the approaching holidays. Besides, the weather is nearly always bad, so that rural people cannot always be at church on the present day of the offering. Now that we have a secretary for this most important work, we ought to give him the very best day we possibly can. I have th ught that, perhaps, the first Lord's day in July would be a better time. That is to o months away from the Home offering and also the Church Extension offering; the weather is almost always good; it is before the hegira of the city pa-tors has begun, no coal bils or taxes to provide for; both city and country churches will have a be ter chance to call out all their membership and it does seem to me that it would be a better date than the one we now have. Last year we raised for Ministerial Relief, $6,173.79 We ought to raise this year not less than $15,000. Every preacher ought to give not less than $200. Many can well afford $5.00. A thousand churches ought to average not less than $5.00. If the board can select a better day, let it be done. If not, let all our churches observe the day with as W. S. PRIEST. liberal offerings as possible.

The State Convention at Anniston, Nov. 12-14, was a success. The disciples pledged themselves to enlarge the work this year. Eigh een preachers were present. Is your Sunday-school using the series of supplies issued by the Christian Publishing Company? If not, why not? The overwhelming testimony of our Sunday school workers proves that they are, in every particular, the best supplies published. Why should you be content to use an inferior grade of leaflets, papers, quarterlies, etc., when you might just as well have the best?

Two thirds of all the Sunday-schools among the Disciples of Christ are now using our supplies. Tais, of itself, is a tremendous argument for their superiority. Is your school numbered with the remaining one-third? If so, will you not investigate a little? Let us send you-free-samples of our supplies. An examination will convince you that our supplies are the best.

We furnish everything needed in the equipment of a first-class school—papers (three grades), lesson leaflets, quarterlies (four grades), annual commentaries (four grades), cards, maps, blackboards, record books, class books, etc., etc.

We are about to enter a new year and a new century. Suppose you start right by securing and using our Sunday school supplies.

The Virginia Missionary Convention.

The 25th annual convention of the churches of Christ in Virginia met in Richmond, Nov. 13-16.

The Virginia Ministerial Association took the first day for the discussion of the question, "How present our plea for Christian unity most effectively?" Six phases of the question were considered according to the program published in this paper and every topic was discussed in a prepared address which was followed by short, informal talks in open parliament.

It was a helpful day. The spirit of the discussions was truly Christian. Loyalty to the Lord and fidelity to the truth were apparent but there was freedom from bigotry, sectarianism and prejudice.

The first session of the missionary convention was Tuesday evening, when Bro. Williamson made an address on "The Church for the Twentieth Century."

On Wednesday morning the Board reported as to the work of the past year, and addresses were made by J. W. West, on "The Work of the Evangelist," by J. D. Hamaker on "The Spirit of Our Plea Evangelistic," by J. T. T. Hundley, on "Missions and Spiritual Culture," and by W. H. Book on "The Missionary Conscience." The report showed in receipts $6,049.86 with a balance on hand of $1,829.39 with which to begin the new year. As compared with the receipts of '98-99, the amount is more than twice as large. Appropriations were made for ten mission points and evangelists were kept in the field.

In the afternoon a good paper was read by J. N. Harman on "Loyalty to Our Church Schools." The Sunday-school conference followed, which was full of short, interesting talks and suggestions. The report of B P. Smith, State Superintendent, showed the number of schools to be 143, and of pupils 9,561 and the amount of money given $4,093.76.

C. A. Young, of Charlottesville, made a strong address in the evening on "The Great Commission." Bro. Stevens followed him with a short talk, telling something of missionary work in Japan.

Thursday morning was given to a conference on state work, consisting of five-minute talks on "The Field and the Forces," and addresses on "The Need of Co-operation," by Harry Minick, on "The Claims of State Missions Paramount," by Wm. Burleigh, and on "The Outlook."

The C. E. Rally, Thursday afternoon, was enthusiastic and spicy. The closing address on "How to Make the Ideal Real or Practical," by Mr. Sheldon, was listened to with much interest. His simplicity and directness were impressive and helpful to all who heard him. The report of the State Secretary of C. E. Work, H. F. Miley, showed 44 Senior and 15 Junior societies, with 995 active and 127 associate members for the 40 societies that reported to him. This is a gain of 302 members over the report of last year.

The evening address was very excellent, made by Bro. Garrison on "Some Triumphs of the Century." The support of a Financial Secretary was provided by subscriptions from individuals, also a number of pledges were made for the new year. Our alm this year is to raise $8,000 and to report 1,000 converts.

The same Board was retained and the convention goes next year to Tazewell, Oct. 29-Nov. 1.

The last day was the C. W. B. M. session. The report showed 66 auxiliaries with a membership of 1,519, contributing $2,865.07. The report of Junior work showed 39 Bands with 810 members, giving $555.69. Individual gifts were made aggregating $903.94; the total sum is $4,314.70, $1,970.81 of this went to Bible Chair work in Virginia University. A splendid conference was istened to in the afternoon on the "Virginia C. W.

B. M., its Development," led by Mrs. Worley, of Bluefield.

In the evening Mrs. C. E. Morgan told very impressively of "The Cost of Success," which was followed by an address on "India," by Miss Bessie Farrar. It was a most telling talk, thrilling and melting the hearts of the hearers. She related in a simple way her experiences and the conquests of the glorious gospel in benighted India. How fitting for the climax and conclusion of the greatest missionary convention in the history of Virginia work.

The experiences and influences of the convention abide with us. The hope and enthusiasm of its sessions remain and will inspire us to press forward in the work of the new year. The future is bright with promise.

We believe a new day is dawning, a day of larger and better things. This convention marks an era in our work.

Bro. Morgan, minister of Seventh Street Church, made every one feel at home and much endeared himself to the visitors and delegates. How good it was to be there, how refreshing to look into the faces of so many brethren in the Lord and how we were lifted up to the very mountain top where, like Peter, we felt like staying.

"It's Not Birth,

NOR WEALTH, NOR STATE, BUT 'GIT UP AND GIT' THAT MAKES MAN GREAT."

This is the motto on the letter head of a well-known grocery firm in Watertown, N. Y., Fred B. Bush & Co., and is indicative of the character of the men. Mr. Bush himself had quite an experience with food in relation to health, as he was refused insurance three years ago because the examining physician found he had Bright's disease and could only live a short time at the best.

"My own physician suggested that I make a radical change in diet. About that time my attention was called to Grape-Nuts food, and I began with doctor's permission to use this food. Of course I had been forbidden the use of sugar or starchy food, but my doctor knew that Grape-Nuts was composed of the starch of wheat and barley transformed into grape sugar and in this condition is easily digested.

"To make a long story short, Grape-Nuts has been a constant dish at my table for three years. I have taken no medicine during this time and I am now strong and healthy and capable of doing a hard day's work every day."

So much for pure food, properly selected and perfectly cooked by experts at the factory. There is not a single disease in the category of human ills but what can be helped by the use of pure food of this character, and most of the ordinary diseases can be cured.

Jefferson City, Nov. 26—Bro W. F. Richardson gave us two weeks of his valuable time in a protracted meeting, beginning Nov. 7, and closing Nov. 24. But, while disappointed in this regard, I am glad to say that great and lasting good was done to the congregation. We are stronger in the fairh and more hopeful for the future. The outlook for the church here has been greatly brightened. It is needless to say that Bro. Richardson greatly endeared himself wall or when the prophility and less to say that Bro. Richardson greatly endeared himself to all our hearts, the preaching and presence of such a man is a benediction to any community. It is due to him and his church to say that his services were given without money and without price. The deep interest they have in the church here and thir desire for its success prompted to this, and the kindly services are appreciated by all of us. We are agitating the question of a new house which is so sarely needed. question of a new house which is so sorely needed,

STRUGGLING TOWARD THE LIGHT.

BY WALTER S. SMITH.

ap. VI .- The Meeting at Luzon Continued.

True to his word, the "little preacher" me forward with his wife, to receive ristian fellowship and the hand was exided to Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Marshall, to d, George and the two Henrys. Luzon s considerably "wrought up" over the arse things were taking, and throngs me in from all the neighborhoods adjoining. e two Baptist congregations were every ht represented, and in the next week, six the members from Little Blue followed oir preacher's example, and were enrolled Luzon. Others came almost every day d night, and the interest became remark-

Paul had a brother younger than himself o was gifted much in the same way; but ose circumstances had run him astray, o skepticism. He was not hopelessly ne; but he had a good while ago ceased to an active church worker. Knowing him be an extraordinary singer, Paul wrote n to come to Luzon and assist in that rvice.

The exhortations increased in warmth, d very substantial accessions were iched. One day Paul and his brother as were walking along a row of cottages, nearly all of which they had made acaintance; and as they passed one belongto a man named Tharpe, one of his ughters came to the door and said: "Bro. thrie, I wish you and your brother would me in; I want to talk with you." As ich of the work had been done personally, is was an agreeable invitation. This ung lady was a bright and talented girl, hose mother belonged to a family very nspicuous in the Christian Church. It had already seemed to Paul a little queer that she had held aloof, when so many others were yielding to the power of the gospel.

Without waiting for formalities, she began: "I know what you are thinking; and I cannot say you are wrong. You think I ought to be in the church? I think so, too; but there is an obstacle in my way. I wanted to ask: Do you think Christians may follow dancing?"

Paul answered, as in the previous case, with a counter question: "Why, Miss Jessie, do you ask that question?"

"I suppose," she replied, "that I do not believe, myself, that they should dance. At any rate, I am not sure that they may."

'Well, there was a great preacher in the East, who said a young person might safely abstain from a practice whose propriety she doubted. A much greater than the preacher in the East said, 'Abstain from all appearance of evil.' And another said, 'If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things."

She listened attentively, and then replied, "I thought you would view it in that way, and I believe all you say is right. But, oh! it will be so hard for me! I am fond of dancing; and if there is any point in which I excel it is this. I am always invited and all my best friends are of the dancing class. We are, even now, organized in a regular dancing club, and it is our favorite pastime. If I become a church member, and give up dancing and the social games of cards, I will be as effectually separated from my best friends as if I were dead."

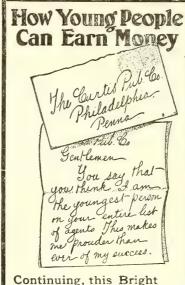

"I appreciate your situation, daughter, and I know much of the struggles of the young. We reach little, however, without a struggle. It is true, too, that our profession requires a separation from the world, very much like death. Paul calls it a 'death to sin;' and many a man has had to sacrifice, seemingly, everything to be a Christian. The Savior says: 'Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me cannot be my disciple.' There are, indeed, many assurances in the New Testament that Christianity is a life of cross-bearing; but there is joy even in this. The Word counsels us to count it all joy when we 'fall into divers temptations."

She asked: "Bro. Guthrie, is any other one's cross as great as mine? It seems to me that it cannot be."

Paul heard her with respect, and then answered with this parable:

"There was a great king who had a daughter whom he loved as his own soul. Every day her wishes were anticipated; and, by the sweetest of choirs, her praises were sung. Cohorts of servants vied with one another to render her such services as would make her always happy.

"One day the king approached her and said: 'Daughter, there is a rebellion among my subjects, and my enemy is becoming more and more their master. I wish you to undergo a wonderful transformation, whereby you may visit these rebels; live as one of their number; suffer the consequences of their rebellion; and sorrow among them even more than they themselves. By your efforts to uproot the cause of their disloyalty, you will incur their hatred, and their leaders will ostracize, malign and reject you, and at last clamor for your death. And, after you are murdered in a most disgraceful way, they will boast that my will has been thwarted, and my enemy enthroned.

"'But, by this act of consecration on your part, you will have planted the seeds of loyalty; and, after your death, and on account thereof, my rule will be restored.' The maiden very promptly replied: 'I will go, Father; for thus it seemeth good in Thy sight.' "

Miss Tharps interposed, with evident excitement, "Oh! pray! do not carry the story farther! I know what it all means. My Savior gave up all for me, cheerfully, and I should be ashamed to murmur over what I must surrender for him. I see the justice of it; and I shall hope for courage to do as I

The brothers left to make other calls and. on account of the interest felt in the meeting, this incident was but little spoken of. Thursday and Friday night passed by, and yet no Jessie Tharpe. On Saturday, Paul sang and talked all day, and when evening came his voice was so worn that he could scarcely speak above a whisper. Moreover, he had for discussion, THE HEART, which he had discussed on two evenings before and now, although it was a special feature of the heart commonly called the conscience, he found himself at a loss for illustrations. His text was: "If our heart condemn us God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things." Feeling that he had not preached so poor a sermon in all the meeting, he closed with an exhortation less forcible than his appeals had been before. But what was his astonishment, when down the south aisle came Miss Jessie; down the north aisle, her sister Louise, and following each of them three others—the very friends she said she must abandon! It was the best night of the meeting; and thus was realized to her and to the preacher the promise enjoyed by the Apostle: 'My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect through weakness."

(Illustrated Sermon.)

The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.—Matt. 26:41.

Two men lived neighbor to each other, though they were not always neighborly. In fact, one of the men entertained an antipathy towards the other which amounted at times to actual animosity. There had been a slight misunderstanding between them over some trivial matter, and the refusal of one of them to "forgive and forget," when asked by the other to do so, had resulted in almost every subsequent act being misconstrued and magnified by the unforgiving man into evidence of unfriendliness and premeditated attempts to injure him in some way. Thus the ill-feeling was not only maintained but increased. How one's passions thrive upon themselves!

It was a fact that the man who had the enmity of his neighbor was somewhat eccentric at times, though it was unanimously agreed that his peculiarities were harmless. All who knew him believed that he would not intentionally wrong any person, not even an enemy. People where he lived knew but little of his ancestry, for he seemed to manifest a desire to keep his family history an entire secret. This was one of his eccentricities, to hide away in the archives of his memory the annals of his ancestors and to vigilantly guard the same against all intruders.

One day late in the autumn he was suddenly taken very ill and soon died. A large concourse of people attended the funeral, for notwithstanding his peculiarities they all had a very high regard for him as an honest, industrious man, a true friend in time of need, and one whose moral character was above reproach. Even his unforgiving neighbor was there.

An old minister had been summoned from a distant part of the country to conduct the funeral service, and in his obituary preceding the sermon he said, "It was my good fortune to have known the deceased and his family for many years. He was a good man, as you can all no doubt testify, and came of a noble, unselfish and very intelligent though rather eccentric ancestry. As you perhaps know there was in his family a predisposition towards insanity, which seemed to be slightly manifested in the harmless eccentricities of the deceased in his lifetime. His grandfather, who was an unusually brilliant man, lost his reason under stress of very sad circumstances, and for a time had to be confined in an asylum. An uncle, while temporarily deranged, committed suicide."

All had been explained by these incidental remarks of the old minister. There could be no doubt but what heredity was responsible for all of this man's peculiarities, and the pages of ancestral history were never turned for the curious and inquiring to read the sad chapters it contained regarding the unavoidable misfortunes that had tarnished the family.

PETE.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

VI.-How the Black Lady Turned White.

The next morning Pete got up before any of the family, and hurriedly dressed. She slipped out of the house and ran toward the back lot, noticing the heavy dew on the grass and the sweet freshness of the world that comes with the sunrise. The barn door was propped open as usual, for ever since the tramp had made his threat, Mrs. Morris had warned her children not to shut it. Pete slipped up the ladder that led to the loft with a fluttering heart. There was one window in the loft, and as it faced the east, the golden sunshine poured through, striking upon the ceiling on the opposite side; for the sun was not up high enough to throw his light upon the floor. Usually Pete liked to watch the sunshine that came through the loft window, it always looked so dusty and lazy and good-humored. But this morning she took no pleasure in it. There on the hay lay a disreputable figure, a man fast asleep. It was Nap, the tramp. Pete had come up on purpose to see Nap, but somehow the sight of him made her want to go back home. She perched upon the head of the ladder, so she could slide down whenever she wanted to. And she kept her eyes fastened upon the sleeping form. 'At last it stirred, as if Nap could feel those bright young eyes. He threw his arm over his head and stiffened his knees and then opened his eyes. The first thing he saw was the little girl. He sat up suddenly, and she took one step down the ladder. But he did not try to come at her, so she went no further.

"Well, good-morning," said Nap crossly, "and who are you?"

"I am Prudence," said Pete. She didn't want him to be calling her by her pet name. "What have you did with your kodak?" he inquired.

"I have not been taking your picture," said Pete. "I came up here to see you."

"Oh," he said, clasping his knees in his grimy hands and staring at her. "You must excuse my appearance, Miss Prulence. Had I of knowed that I was to have comp'ny so soon in the morning I would have made my toilet the night afore."

"Well," said Pete, "the reason I came so early, you always go off before breakfast, so I took my only chance, you see."

"I am sorry," said Nap, "that I didn't know you wanted me to stay longer. I judged that the sooner I went the better your ma would be pleased. If I had of knowed you wished my comp'ny, I'd a-died in my tracks afore I'd a-gone away."

"You can't go too soon to please us," was the reply, "and that's what I came to see you about; to ask you to go away and stay away."

"Oh! Well, Miss Prudence," said he, looking down the side of his nose, "as you're in your own house you can talk as you please. But if you was visiting me, I'd have my right arm sawed off—this here one—afore I'd talk to you so unkind and impolite. But this is your place and I got to take it."

"It isn't the same as if you were visiting," said Pete, willing to justify herself.

"And you come to see me," said Nap, interrupting her, "and will I make you sleep in my barn? Not much! I'll let down the folding-bed in the parlor, and kill a chickun and have in the neighbors to see you. That's hospitality. Why, I knowed a little boy once, and he had to work for a living. Payrents was dead and didn't have nothing. So he was a bootblack. One day a gentleman druve into town in a carriage and see the little boy with his kit. 'Do you black boots?' says he. Boy says, 'Yes.' Out jumps the man. 'Swear to me to black both my boo's for a dime?' says he. Boy swears and hopes he may die if he don't. Then sees that the gentleman have only one leg; other leg just a wooden peg, no boot on it. Boy blacks the one boot. 'Gimme dime,' says the boy. 'Not much,' says the gentleman. 'Git in this carriage,' he says, 'and come and I'll take you to my other Leg; boot's on that other Leg. Remember you've swore to black both boots,' says he. Boy was skeered, but gets in carriage. Gentleman druve and druve tell he come to a big, black forest, nothing but trees and pisen-oak. On and on and on he druveit getting blacker'n' blacker'n' skerrier'n skerrier. Then of a sudden the boy h ars a wild, strange noise a-going this way: 'Wollo, wollo, wollo-ee! Wollo, wello, wollo-ee!"

"What was it?" asked Pete, quite breathless with excitement. And if you had heard how Nap said "Wollo," and how he looked when he said it, I presume you would have been excited, too.

"That's what the boy didn't know," said Nap, leaning back on the hay. "'What is it?' says he to the gentleman. Gentleman nuver say narry word, just druv and druv on through the pitchy black forest. Bimeby boy heerd the sound agin, only now it was ever so much nearer, a-goin', 'Wollo, wollo, wollo-ee! Wollo, wollo-ee!' Boy, all a-trembling and the tears a-streaming down his countenance, says, 'Oh, sir, what is that?' Gentleman says, 'That miserable, doomed wretch air my Other Leg.' Then of a sudden there came a crashing through the bushes a monster Leg, and on it was a great big rusty boot. 'Black it!' says the gentleman. The poor boy got out, and taken his brush and

ZACCHAEUS THE PUBLICAN.*

It was in Jericho, the City of Palms, and the Passover was nigh at hand. Already, in the tropical climate of the lower Jordan valley, the flowers and fruits of summer were seen on every hand. The balsam trees, which were so numerous, and whose odors perhaps gave to the city its pame, Jericho, "the perfumed;" the wealth of flowers, from whose fragrant hearts the swarming bees drew their abundant stores of honey; the gnarled trunks and writhing branches of the olive, whose fruit formed a staple in the common food and traffic of the people; and the graceful palms, the queen of oriental trees, conspired to make this spot, now a dreary ruin, one of the most beautiful cities of Palestine. Many rulers had here built their palaces, and great aqueducts supplied with water from the adjacent springs the blooming gardens and fertile vineyards. As one of the levicical cities, it was a favorite residence of the priests, and he was counted fortunate who could spend his life in its delightful climate.

But Jericho was likewise a center of trade, and an important station for the caravans on their route from Damascus to Jerusalem and Egypt. It was inevitable that the customs, and other forms of trade tax ation, should require the presence of many officials. These officers of the Roman government, who were known as publicans, or collectors of the public revenues, were, as we have already learned, hated bitterly by the Jewish people. And, in many instances, deservedly so, for they used all the power of their offices to wring from an oppressed people the last farthing of their hard-earned wages, beyond the barest living, to enrich those who had purchased the taxes of the various districts. He who could secure a position as "cnief," or commissioner of taxes, as we might designate him, had a fortune in his reach. The fact that these men were usually Jews made them more odious to their nation, who looked upon them as traitors, who had sold themselves to the oppressor of their people.

Prominent among these chief publicans was one whose name, Z.cchæus, meaning "just" or "pure," was doubtless spoken with a sneer by his fellowcitizens. He was rich; and, from his subsequent confession, we may believe that his wealth was the result of the cruei and dishonest pursuit of his calling, in which he had gone so far as to swear faisely against some of his victims before the magistrates. He shared in the universal excitement that attended the visit of Jesus to Jericho. News of the raising of Lazarus from the grave, which had occurred but a few weeks p evi uely, would quickly fly from Bethany to Jericho, on the lips of the thousands of travelers who had passed to and fro since that time. To this general desire Zaccheus would add one of a more personal character. It was freely reported that Jesus did not share in the popular hatred for the publican. His enemies charged, and his friends admitted, that he fr quently ate in their houses, and even that he had chosen one of them, Levi Matthew, to be of the number of his closest disciples. Zacchæus determined that he would at least see the face of this famous Rabbi, who seemed to draw upon himself the warmest praise and fiercest accusation.

But there were many difficulties in the way. A great multitude of Passover pilgrims crowded around the Nazarene, so that approach was difficult, if not impossible. Besides, Zacchæus was so hated that his presence in the excited crowd might be unsafe. Then, too, he was very short of stature, so that he would need to force his way n to the very presence of Jesus, to see him at all. Better give it up, would have been the decision of a faint heart. But this man had something of heroic stuff in him, and he would not be balked in his purpose. The same persistence that had given him success in his office brought him its reward now. He ran ahead on the way by which Jesus was to pass, and climbed into a sycamore tree, a species of fig, and there awaited the coming of the crowd. Not a very dignified position for a rich man, a prominent office-holder of the great city of Jericho. No, but he was in earnest, and when men set their hearts on anything, they forget such little matters as the question what folks will say about them. Ridicule is a bugbear of cowards. Brave men ignore it.

The prophet of Nazareth came along the street, and passed beneath the branch where Zacchæus was perched. He had a clear view of that pure countenance, with its noble brow, its searching yet kindly glance, its patient, loving mouth. Goodness was written in every feature. His heart assured him that this man could not be other than saintly, and already his heart began to warm toward him. Suddenly the Saviour fixed his eyes upon the publican, and quietly, as though he recognized in him a familiar friend, spoke to him, "Zacchæus, make haste and come down; for to-day I must abide in thy house." Zacchæus almost fell out of the tree, in his excitement. What, would the great prophet indeed bonor him with his presence in his own home? He would hardly have dared to invite him, knowing how the people would resent it. And now Jesus chooses his home, out of all in Jericho, for his lodging. No marvel that he hastened down from the tree, and joyfully received Jesus as his guest. Base as he was, he felt deeply the honor that the Master had shown him, and for the time ignored as did Jesus, the murmurings and criticisms of the multitude.

What transpired in the home of Zacchaeus we do not know, save as to its result upon the host himself. We may be assured that the Master breathed in that household the same spirit of holiness that made his presence always a benediction. To Zacchæus there came a new birth of desire and purpose. Now that this wonderful prophet, this holy and divinely gracious man, had so signally honored him as to enter his home in preference to all others, ought he not to honor himself by abandoning the evil life he had lived, and emulate the righteousness of this One, whose spiritual hearty had revealed its loveliness even to such a sordid heart? What the scornful derision of the multitude and the bitter curses of the Pharisees had failed to accomplish, gentle love had wrought in a single hour, "As all that was base in him would have been driven into defiance by contempt and hatred, so all that was noble was evoked by a considerate tenderness." He could not resist the strange new impulse that swelled in his heart. He would break at once with the old life, and show himself worthy of this gracious confidence. Suddenly he arose to his feet and, looking into the face of Jesus, said, with tearful eye and voice trembling with earnestness, "Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have wrongfully exacted aught of any man, I restore fourfold." Such repentance as this bears the surest seal of genuineness. The heart of this sordid man, this greedy and exacting publican, has been touched by the finger of God, and has responded to its gentle appeal. "Thus did love unseal by a single touch those swelling fountains of penitence which contempt would have kept closed forever."

With what joy must Jesus have heard those words, and observed the emotion of his host. From that heart whose deepest satisfaction was that of saving sinners came the glad words, "Today is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham." The surest proof of salvation is the exhibition of a spirit of penitence and love. When the fountains of the deep are broken up, there will come to the surface such acts as will demonstrate the presence of truth and righteousness in the soul. This chief of the publicans, despite his record of oppression and fraud, is still a son of Abraham. He needed but to feel the glory of the birthright he had forfeited to seek it again. The best and strongest appeal to the sinner is that of his divine descent, and the sweetness and fulness of that which he has lost through sin. Make him understand that the Father awaits his return, that the home is still wide open for his reception, and his heart may be touched by repentance. "For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost." Zacchæus, think you that it was your seeking to see Jesus that first turned your feet toward the way of life? Nay, it was Jesus seeking you. And, poor sinner, when your wayward heart has turned toward the Heavenly Father, and you reach out your hands for his mercy and love, you will find that his h-art ard hands have all the time been extended toward you in a perfect agony of longing desire. He is seeking you now and always. Why will you let him seek in vain?

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 16.

CONFESSING CHRIST.

[Matt. 10:32 39.)];

Many people say that it is not at all necessary to make any open or public confession of faith in Christ. They consider that it is enough to believe privately in Jesus and that the public profession is superfluous.

Against this idea the Christian Endeavor Society takes an uncompromising stand. It believes that it is needful to declare openly one's faith, that there must be no doubt of one's position, that there can never be the highest spiritual life without such confession made.

And it is upon this last classe that such position can most strongly be taken. Unless we confess Christ we cannot rise to Christ's level. We may be able to obtain some moiety of a Christian likeness; but we can never become Christ-like. "Whoso confesses me, him will I confess by making him like me," is a possible paraphrase of Christ's words.

The one thing that the great preachers have earnestly sought to do is to prevail upon men and women to take a decided position; not to stand afar and behold Christ and wonder at his beauty; but to draw near to him, identify themselves with him, take a stand with his people.

Jesus said: I am not come to leave any man or woman neutral in this matter. He that is not with me is against me No comprom'se is possible. I set persons against fathers and mothers if necessary. There is no middle course. Wendell Phillips, on his way to address a furious mob in Boston, felt a note thrust into his hand. It was from his wife, and read: "Wendell, no shilly-shally in the face of that mob." Jesus says to everyone who cares for him: "No half-way measures. Declare for me. What is that to thee? Follow thou me."

This is not to say that anyone is to make undue display of their religious allegiance. There are those who go about with their Bibles under their arms and themselves upon their faces. There are many who have constant professions upon their lips, whose hearts are strong with self centering. There are pharisees to-day, as in the year one, or the year thirty.

Nor is this to say that Endeavorers or Christians are to peer impertinently into the spiritual affairs of their neighbors. Religion does not consist in indiscriminate membership. Jesus meant nothing of this sort. He came not to set children against parents, or parents against children by undue assertion of religious differences. There are those who think they are confessing Christ, when they are but confessing some religious dogma.

After all, the highest and best witness for Christ, the truest confession, is to be found in a life that is avowedly, but humbly and not selfassertively, devoted to the Master's service. A face which reflects the face of our great exemplar, a life which gives out the perfume of the lily of the valley, a heart that is gentle and kind and true, like his, this is a picturing forth of him before the world. This is confession.

GILBERT.

Elder D. W. Giltert was born in Allen Co., Ohio, June 18, 1843. Died at his home near Palacedro, Col., Sept. 29, 1900, aged 57 years, 3 months and 11 days. He leaves to mourn his loss, a loving wife, seven sons, (two by his former wife) and four daughters, also his father, two brothers and two sisters who reside in Iowa and Nebrasks, and a host of brethren and friends. Bro. Gilbert was an affectionate husband and indulgent father and greatly beloved by all who knew him. Some six or seven years ago he preached for the congrega-tions at Galt and Acampo. Was quite successful in his work there, especially among the young people. He always had a warm place in his great heart for every brother and sister and they loved him fondly in re urn. With an aching heart and tear-dimmed eyes I pen these lines because I shall see him "never more" till I enter that "blissful abode." Of late years he has labored for the most part in Shasta Co., and some hundreds have been led by him to the Master. He has sacrificed much for Christ but his trials and sacrifices are o'er. The funeral service was conducted by Bro. Ferguson, attendance being the larges: known in that locality for years. Bro. Gilbert died of neuralgia of the heart; was sick only about fifteen hours. All that medical skill and tender hearts and loving hands could do brought to the sufferer no relief. His suffering was intense. He said, "My work is done," and fell asleep. Dear sister, we weep with you and may our leving Father and blessed Savior who tasted death for every man sustain you and the children he has given you until "sorrow and sighing shall flee away and there shall be no more death" and the Lord God shall wipe away all tears from our faces. THE HEALTH HABIT

Just as Easy to Form as Any Other.

We do not deliberately form our pet habits, but they are unconsciously acquired and grow as we grow, and by the time we learn they are hurting us, we find them too strong to be easily broken

Then, why not form a good habit, a habit which will counteract the many bad ones, in other words contract the unfashionable habit of being always well.

The best health habit to get into is to have and keep a vigorous stemach; if you have a healthy digestion you can drink your beloved coffee, smoke your favorite brand of tobacco, with little or no harm; the mischief begins when these things are forced upon the faithful stomach, without any assistance

Form the habit of taking after meals some harmless but efficient digestive which will relieve the stomach of so much extra work.

Nature furnishes us with such digestives and when they are combined with such a pleasant preparation as Stua t's Dyspesia Tablets, they give the overworked stemach just the necessary assistance to secure perfect digestion without any of the harmful effects of cathartics and similar drugs.

The habit of taking Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after meals is as necessary to the weak stomach as food itself, and indeed to get the benefit from food eaten, nothing better and certainly nothing safer can be u-ed.

Many families consider Stuart's Tablets as essential in the house as knives and forks.

They consist entirely of natural digestive principle without the effect or characteristics of drugs; they have no cathartic action, but simply go to work on the food eaten and digest it.

Take into account your bad habits and the expense they entail and then invest fifty cents in a box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets and see if your digestion for the next month is not vastly improved.

Ask the clerk in any drug store the name of the most successful and popular stomach remedy and he will say Stuart's.

RICE.

Bro. Wm. Rice was born Feb. 17, 1821, in Maury Co., Tenn. Was married to Ediza J. Campbell, Dec. 9, 1847. To them were born eight children. Bro. W. A. Rice is the only surviving one of the children. Bro. Wm. Rice was baptized by Barton W. Stone when he was twenty years of age and has been a devoted follower of Christ and loyal disciple until his death, which was Oct. 6th, 1900. For twenty-five years he has been a respected and influential member of Saratoga, Cal. He was one of the charter members of the church organized here twenty years ago. For years he served as one of the elders. For twenty-five years Bro. Rice has never missed a state meeting until the last one. He was well posted in the Scriptures and zealous in all good works. All these years he has been most generous in his offerings for Christ's cause. He came of a family of twelve children of which three were prominent preachers, and all members of the Christian Church. Sister Rice—aunt Liza, as she is familiarly called, who has been his noble and true helpmeet for nearly fifty-three years and her son, Bro. Allen, his wife and three grandchildren are the immediate relatives who look forward to a glad reunion. Bro. Rice was loved and es-teemed by all who knew him. He could truly say, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge shall give me at the last day.' S. A. NESBIT. Saratoga, Cal., Nov. 3.

A prominent business man of Cincinnati has invented a Vapor Bath Cabinet that has proven a blessing to every man, woman and child who has used it, and as many of our readers may not know of its real comfort and blessings, we illustrate it in the issue. this issue

Envigorating effects of the famous Turkish, Hot Vapor, Hot Air, or Medicated Vapor Bath, with no possibility of taking cold afterwards, or in any way weakening the system.

Hundreds of well-known physicians have given up their practice to sell this Cabinet—such eminent men as Emerson McKay, Detroit, who has already sold over 700, and John C. Wright, Chicago, who sold 125 last month.

Thousands of remarkable letters have been written the makers from users, some of which, referring to

Rheumatism, La Grippe, Kidney Troubles,

Rheumatism, La Grippe, Kidney Troubles, will be interesting to those who suffer from these dread maladies. W. L. Brown, Oxford, O., writes: "My father was down in bed for months with rheumatism; this Cabinet did him more good than $50 worth of drugs. It cured my brother of neuralgia and sleeplessness, with which he had long suffered, and his wife of la grippe in one night." G. M. Lafterty, Covington, Ky., writes: "Was compelled to quit business a year ago, being prostrated with rheumatism and kidney troubles, when your Cabinet came. Two weeks' use cured me; I have never had a twinge since." Rev. George H. Hudson, Okemos, Mich., says: "I gave up my pastorate on account of nervous prostration and lung troubles; my editor so highly recommended your Cabinet; I tried it; from that day I have steadily grown better; am now well; nervousness gone; lungs strong; am a new man." Mr. Simon Tompkins, a retired capitalist of Columbus, O., 1031 Broad St., says: "I am satisfied it saved my life. I was taken down with a hard cold, which developed into a dangerous case of pneumonia. The first Bath relieved me and I quickly recovered. It is far superior to drugs for curing la grippe, colds, inflammation and rheumatism." Hon. A. B. Strickland, of Bloomington, writes that the Cabinet did him more good than two years' doctoring, entirely cured him of catarth, gravel, kidney trouble and dropsy, with which he had long been afflicted.

Hundreds of Ministers

write praising this Cabinet. Rev. H. C. Roernaes, Everett, Kan., says: "It is a blessing; made me full of life and vigor; should be in use in every family." Rev. J. C. Richardson, N. Fifth St., Roxbury, Mass., was greatly benefited by its use, and recommends it highly, as also does Prof. R. E. P. Kline, of Ottawa University, who says: "I find it a great benefit. No Christian should be without it." Hon. V. C. Hay, St. Joe, Mo., writes: "Physicians gave me up to die; was persuaded by friends to try this Cabinet, and it cured me. I cannot praise it enough." Rev. Baker Smith, D. D., Fairmont, N. J., says: "Your Cabinet rids the body of aches and pain, and as cleanliness is next to godliness, it merits high recommendation."

Congressman John J. Lentz, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, John T. Brown, Editor "Christian Guide"; Rev. C. M. Keith, Editor "Holiness Advocate," as well as hundreds of clergymen, bankers, governors, physicians and influential people, recommend it highly.

Physicians are unanimous in claiming that colds, la grippe, fevers, smallpox, consumption, kidney trouble, Bright's disease, cancer—in fact, such this Cabinet has marvelous power. Dr. Shepard, of Brooklyn, states that he has never failed to draw out the deadly poison of snake bites, hydrophobia, blood poison, etc., by this Vapor Bath, proving that it is the most wonderful blood purifier known. If people, instead of filling their system with more poisons by taking drugs and nostrums, would get into a Vapor Bath Cabinet and steam out these poisons, and assist nature to act, they would have pure blood, and a skin as clear and smooth as the most fastidious could desire.

The Important Feature of this Cabinet is that it gives a hot vapor bath that opens the millions of pores all over the body, stimulating the sweat glands, drawing out all the impure salts, acids, and effete matter, which, if retained, overwork the heart, kidneys, lungs, and cause disease, debility and sluggishuess. Astonishing is the improvement in health, feeling and complexion. The first bath makes you feel like a new being: 10 years younger.

When closed it is air-tight; handsomely made of best, most durable, water-proof goods, rubber lined A heavy steel frame supports it, making it a strong and substantial bathroom within itself. It has top curtains; in fact, all the latest improvements. The makers furnish an excellent stove with each Cabinet, also valuable recipes and formulas for medicated baths and ailments, as well as plain directions. It folds flat in 1 inch space, when not in use; easily carried; weighs but 10 pounds.

People don't need bathrooms, as this Cabinet may be used in any room, and bath tubs have been discarded since this invention, as it gives a far better bath for all cleansing purposes than soap and water. For the sick room its advantages are at once apparent. There have been on the market, but they were unsatisfactory, inconvenient, simply cheap, flimsy affairs.

After investigation we can say the Quaker Cabinet made by the Cincinnati firm is the only practical article of its kind, and will last for years. It seems to satisfy and delight every user, and the Book Notes.

We are anticipating a very large Chris'mas trade this year, and are preparing to handle it with promptness, that our patrons may suffer no disappointments. There is every reason why we should expect to sell many thousands of books during December. Firstly, the good people of these United States are very rapidly coming to appreciate the fact that the ideal Christmas gift is a good book; secondly, the country is enjoying prosperity and the people can afford to buy books; thirdly, we are offering our patrons a much larger and better assortment of books than ever before, at prices which are certain to attract careful and judicious buyers.

You have probably received, before you read his, a copy of our "Special Christmas Catalogue." 't's a handsome little thing, isn't it? If you have treceived a copy, notify us at onc o and we w send you one. You hould not miss having it, for it may save you several dollars in the purchase of Christmas gifts for your family and friends. In it are described and priced nearly three hundred different volumes suitable for Christmas gifts, including books of all kinds—all good kinds, that is—at all prices, for all sorts of folks.

We desire to call especial attention to our Christmas list of books for boy: and girls—volumes adapted to the reading of children from eight to sixteen years of age. These volumes are not of the silly, gody-goody. "Sunday school-storybook" type, on the one hand, nor of the blood and thunder "Dead-shot Dave, the Texas Terror," style, on the other. They are clean, wholesome, interesting stories, which will entertain the young folks without harming them. Such literature for the young is rather scarce, and we have spent much time and thought in selecting a list o books that we could, in good conscience, heartily recommend to parents and teachers. This list is given in our Christmas Catalogue, and will also be found elsewhere in this issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

You ought to remember your pastor at Christmas time. It is certain that he frequently sighs to himself that his income will not permit him to buy many helpful books that he would like to have. Why not delight him by a gift of some such volume as "The Circuit of the Globe," "The Miracl s of Jesus," "Elijah," "Leaves from Mission Fields" or a set of Alexander Campbell's works? Think about this, and then let us hear from you. You can casually drop into the pastor's study and, while charting with him, note what books he already has on his shelves, so that you will not give him a duplicate of a volume he already possesses.

We urge Sunday-schools and Christian Endeavor Societies to at once equip themselves with the proper supplies for the new year. No school or society can do its best work without the necessary equipment. It is a false economy to try to get along without supplies, or to adopt a certain series of supplies just because they are cheap. The best are really the cheapest. Inferior supplies are dear at any price.

Virginia Notes.

Marshall Street Church, Harry Minick, pastor, is in a meeting. They had a big day on last Lord's day. Two confessions and two by letter added. They had a church rally and it was well attended; many members present that had not been in the church for monets.

Bro. McHattan, of California, is assisting J. P. Lewis at Park View Christian Church, Petersburg, Va., in a meeting.

C. E. Elmore is in a good meeting at Mt. Olivet, four miles from Martinsville. Twenty two added up to November 24. Among the number are the steward and trustees of the church in which the meeting is being conducted. They will turn the house over to the Disciples and an organization will be completed. The meeting will continue several days longer.

Martinsville is to have a negro industrial school. The C. W. B. M. has purchased a most excellent property there and the work will be prosecuted with energy. The best element of the negroes in this section are Disciples. This bids fair to be a movement of great moment in Virginia among the colored Disciples.

W. H. Book will keep C. E. Elmore in this field for a year, as evangelist. He is responsible for his support. Why should not s me of our brethren who have means do a similar work?

Gravel Hill Church in Craig County has lost a most excellent member in the person of Bro. David Kent, who died of typhoid fever. He was Sundayschool superintendent and faithful at all services. Bro. Kent will be missed from the community and the church as well as the home. We extend our sympathy to the bereaved ones.

Spray, N. C., is looking for a pastor. This is a good field and some one should take hold of the work at once.

J. A Spencer, Danville, Va., is doing a good work there. They will pay off their debt and burn the mortgage January 1, 1901. He is wel liked by his people. We look for aggressive work there now.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The present session of Congress is making for itself a reputation for its prompt action upon important measures. The passage of the army reorganization bill with the Bowersock anti-canteen amendment was a piece of exceptionally quick legislation. The bill provides for a standing army of 60,000 and gives the President authority to increase the number to 100,000 at his discretion. This seems to us to be a reasonable and moderate measure. Comparing it with General Miles' recommendation of one soldier for every thousand of population, it provides for slightly less than this under ordinary conditions and somewhat more in times of emergeucy. The anti-canteen amendment, which has been fathered by Mr. Bowersock, of Kansas, was passed by the very gratifying majority of 159 to 51. The speakers in favor of the amendment cited the opinion of many high officers as to the ruinous feffects of the canteen system. The vast number of petitions and appeals which have been received since the nullification of the former anti-canteen amendment by Attorney-General Griggs is evidence that the public wanted another law on the subject expressed in more unequivocal language which could not be misinterpreted. It is believed that in its present form there will be no chance of nullification. convention of the W. C. T. U., which was in session in Washington last week, received the news of the passage of the amendment with great enthusiasm. Mr. Bowersock, the author of the amendment, and Mr. Littlefield, of Maine, who assisted in the legal wording of it, supported it strenuously and argued from the success of prohibition in his own state. are entitled to much credit. They have won the gratitude of all friends of temper-

There has been a big fight before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives over the proposed reduction of the war tax. The tax on beer, which before the war was $1 a barrel, was increased to $2 with an allowance of 71 per cent. for leakage and waste. brewers have sent to Washington a powerful lobby to secure a reduction to the former rate. The committee has recommended that there be no reduction except an increase of the allowance to 20 per cent. which would mean a decrease of the net tax to $1.60 a barrel. The brewers are not inclined to accept this and are strenuously urging the value of their support to the party, which was given in the expectation of a reduction of their tax. It may interest St. Louis readers to know that the chief spokesman of the brewers and the chief defender of brewing as a "legitimate and honorable business" is Congressman Bartholdt, who was also one of the bitterest opponents of the anti-canteen amendment. Tee different arguments for the reduction of the tax on beer are somewhat less plausible when taken together. At one moment it is argued that the burden falls entirely upon the laboring men who consume the article and who must, of course, get a smaller glass or a poorer quality for their nickel. The presence of an expensive lobby at Washington supported by the brewers gives the lie to this statement. Brewers do not support lobbies for the benefit of the laboring man. Again it is argued, inconsistently with the above, that many brewers are failing under the too heavy tax; which we can only hope is true. Again it is pointed out that the consumption of beer has decreased since the tax was increased; which would be a sufficient reason for maintaining it, if the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee had not pointed out that the decrease in 1899 was more than counterbalanced by the increase in 1900. The fight has still to be fought out in Congress. The bill as recommended by the committee gives a total reduction of about $40,000,000, of which $10,000,000 is on beer and the remainder, for the most part, on documentary taxes of one kind or another, including bank cheques, promissory notes, telephone and telegraph messages.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that for the first time since 1893 the government's receipts are greater than its expenditures. The excess on the wrong side of the books during these intervening years has varied from twenty-five to eightynine millions. The surplus of revenue for the fiscal year 1900 is over seventy-nine millions. It is this flush condition of our national pocketbook which makes it possible to reduce the revenue by forty millions in spite of the continuance of many of the expenses which began in the late war or grew out of it and in spite of the projected expenditure of a large sum on the construction of the Isthmian canal.

The Porto Rican Legislature met for its first session on the same day on which Congress assembled. The legislature consists of two bodies, the Executive Council, of which Mr. Hunt is president and which has already been in existence for some time as a cabinet to Gov. Allen, and the House of Delegates, which has now assembled for the first time. The latter, which might be called the lower house, has thirty-one members. Judging from the accounts of the opening session and the organization of the house, the Porto Ricans have much to learn of the arts of politics. The committee on nominations named Senor Quinanes for Speaker, but he modestly declined the honor. Senor Rossy was then nominated and, there being no opposition, was unanimously elected. The simple denizens of this lesser pearl of the Antilles have evidently yet not discovered the political advantages which inhere in the speakership and, to all appearances, the assembly differs strikingly from the Cuban constitutional convention in being devoid of parties. The first act of the Council, after the assembling of the legislature, was to refuse to grant the French railway franchise, the granting of which would have carried with it the guarantee of a certain interest on the investment. The governor's message outlines a plan of internal reorganization, including financial, judicial and educational matters. The New England town and county plan was recommended.

The question of admitting new states to the Union is again being agitated and it is not improbable that before the close of the present session of Congress there will be an act of internal expansion which will place three new stars on the flag. The admission of Arizona, New Mexico and Oklahoma-Indian Territory to statehood will mark the passing of the last of our continental possessions (except Alaska) out of the territorial stage. A convention was held the first part of this week at South McAlester, I. T., composed of representatives from Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, which passed resolutions asking for admission as a single state and appointed a permanent committee of twenty members to keep up the agitation. The combined population of the two territories is not far short of 800,000 and it is claimed that the value of their property is approximately $200,000,000, "which is more people and more wealth than were possessed by any one state when admitted into the Federal Union and is more people and more wealth than are possessed by some of the states now." In view of the admission of Nevada with scarcely more than 50,000 inhabitants and scarcely any resources other than mineral, it seems only right to signalize the beginning of the new century by admitting to statehood this rich and populous territory.

The United States Supreme Court has sustained the state court in declaring the constitutionality of the Missouri election law known as the Nesbit law. This law makes a special class of "cities having a population of over 300,000 inhabitants" and establishes for them a different sort of election machinery. The only city included in this class is St. Louis and it was maintained by those who brought this test case to trial that it was unconstitutional in that it set off one city by itself and, by the special restrictions thrown about its provision for registration, deprived its citizens of that equal protection of law which the constitution guarantees. The court did not take up the question of the justice or injustice of the actual provisions of the law, but declared that "the power to classify cities with reference to their population being exercised in conformity with the constitution of the state, the circumstance that the election law in force in St. Louis was made to differ from that which regulates the conduct of elections in other cities in Missouri does not in itself deny to the citizens of St. Louis the equal protection of the laws." The Nesbit law, therefore, like the Goebel law, which it resembles in many particulars, is declared to be constitutional. Whether or not either one of them is a just law is, of course, another question and one which the United States Supreme Court cannot take upon itself to decide. The legislators of Kentucky, even those of the party which enacted it, came to the conclusion that the Goebel law was too unjust to be allowed to stand. It is to be hoped that the lawmakers at Jefferson City will make the same discovery in regard to the Nesbit law.

Starting with a very trivial dispute in regard to the Dutch Minister at Lorenzo Marguez, Holland and Portugal have developed a quarrel as large and lively as can easily occur between two such insignificant powers. Wilhelmina has recalled her minister from Lisbon and King Carlos has retaliated by recalling his minister from The Hague. The trouble has been further aggravated by the cordial interchanges between the Portuguese King and his aunt, Queen Victoria, at the same time that Queen Wilhelmina is graciously receiving and encouraging ex-President Kruger. In replying to a message from King Carlos, Queen Victoria speaks clearly of an alliance as already existing between England and Portugal, and the recent visit of a British fleet to Portuguese waters bore many of the marks of an interchange of courtesies between sworn allies. It would, of course, be ridiculous to conceive of a war between these two second class powers growing out of such a triviality, but the King of Portugal has in his veins the hot blood of the south and the Queen of Holland is a very headstrong young lady. It is perhaps something of a surprise to most readers to be reminded that King Carlos is a nephew of Queen Victoria, but the ramifications of her family tree are too complicated for most of us to follow with any degree of completeness. She is the grandmother general of most of the ruling dynasties of Europe. It will be remembered that, besides being aunt of the King of Portugal, she is the grandmother of the Emperor of Germany, grandmother of the Czarina of Russia, that she is closely connected with the King of Denmark through the marriage of the Prince of Wales to his daughter, that that same alliance connects her with the King of Greece, who is a son of the King of Denmark, and that several of the dukes and princes of the German Empire have married her daughters and granddaughters.

Triumphs of American diplomacy are being scored nowadays so frequently as to be almost monotonous. Even the British press the anti-administration journals in this country admit that the negotiations between the representatives of the Powers in China have reached a point which may fairly be considered as guaranteeing the adoption of the policy initiated and advocated by our State Department. The policy of making the punishment for the Boxer outrages commensurate with the ability of the Chinese government, rather than with the crimes it has countenanced, was first suggested by Secretary Hay. The other Powers have at last agreed to this and the terms of the preliminary treaty, now fully agreed upon, are ready for signature. Minister Conger has been instructed by cable to sign the protocol. Question is now being raised again as to the authority of the Chinese envoys, Li Hung Chang and Prince Ching, to represent their government. They have no official documents showing their appointment and it may be difficult to hold the government to the performance of their promises. Many flimsy excuses have been presented for their lack of proper authorization. The real reason doubtless is that the government wishes to keep a large loop hole through which to escape the performance of what may be agreed upon. Meanwhile the return of the court to Pekin has become a somewhat less remote possibility. The degradation of General Tung, who has had virtual command of the imperial household, may be considered as a step in that direction.

The brilliant career of General DeWet, who has given the British in South Africa an unexpected amount of trouble in the last few weeks and has gone far toward turning guerrilla warfare into an actual and aggressive campaign, appears to be about at an end for the present. Bloemfontein, which was lately threatened by his successful advance, is now safe and General Knox is pursuing his force north from Rouxville. Hemmed in on one side by the confluence of two swollen rivers and on the other by three columns of British troops, it begins to appear that the gallant DeWet has reached his last ditch. There are unsubstantiated rumors of a hard fight at this place. If it has not occurred it will and the almost inevitable result will be the crushing of the largest single body of belligerent Boers now in the field. There will remain, of course, many small commandoes of guerrillas which will give infinite trouble for a considerable time. Meanwhile the war leaders in Parliament have been made the target for stinging criticism. Lord Rosebery has made a fierce attack upon the administration's policy of holding an election at this time to catch Khaki vote, and both Chamberlain and Salisbury have found it necessary to defend themselves repeatedly. In general the Liberals are concentrating and the Conservatives are concil ating.

An invasion of England by a foreign enemy is not one of the things which have been considered probable even in these war-like endof-the-century times. Yet it has been suggested, apparently in all seriousness, by a member of the French Senate. The publicity of the suggestion robs it of any grain of serious import which it might possibly have had. Gen. Mercier, who suffered serious loss of prestige in connection with the Dreyfus affair, in the course of a speech in favor of increasing the navy began to discuss the possibility of an invasion of England. The developments of scientific warfare during the century, he said, would make it easy to carry such a project into effect. He announced that he himself had worked out a plan for a hostile landing on the channel coast and was proceeding to outline it when he was interrupted and ruled out of order. The British papers treated the affair with the gaiety which it demanded. Gen. Mercier was an object of much contempt before. He has now succeeded in getting himself laughed at as well as despised.

HUMAN AGENCY IN SALVA-TION.

A recent editorial in the Sunday-school Times entitled, "Not a duty to work out one's salvation," is noteworthy as showing that the theory which many of us had supposed was obsolete among intelligent Bible scholars and theologians is yet held and finds expression in a religious journal of at least national if not international reputation. The editor, who is also quite as widely known as his paper, if not even more so, because of his authorship of some able books, in the editorial mentioned undertakes to correct what he believes to be a general misinterpretation of the passage in the Philippian letter in which Paul says to the Philippian brethren; "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." We quote:

"The common idea as to this text is that it means that the sinner has a share in the work of securing his own salvation. As a matter of fact, it means nothing of the sort.

"Salvation is Christ's work. It is not a work that is partly Christ's and partly the sinner's. He who begins a good work will doubtless finish it. This we are to believe, and this we are to teach. Our share in our salvation is not to our credit, but to the aided credit of our Savior."

And then the editor cites the case of the New England boy, of whom our readers have doubtless heard before, who, on applying to the church authorities for admission, and on being asked, "Who saved you?" replied, "It was the work of Jesus Christ and myself." On being asked, "What was your share in the work of your salvation?" he replied, "I resisted, and Jesus Christ did the rest." This incident is quite common property among modern evangelists and is made to do service in the interest of the Calvinistic theory of conversion. The Sunday-school Times observes that "that boy understood the case better than one who thinks that he has a part of his own salvation to accomplish by personal endeavor."

Is this not a fundamental misapprehension of the whole question of what salvation is, and what is man's relation to it? That the editor of the Sunday-school Times should give currency, at this date, to a view of con version that runs contrary to the whole tenor of New Testament teaching, is a most remarkable fact. It is also a matter of profound regret. Nothing, it seems to us, can be more unfortunate than for a prominent and accredited teacher of the Christian religion to persuade men that they have nothing to do, and therefore no responsibility in the matter of their salvation; that like the New England boy they can even resist Christ and vet be converted and saved! Why then should men concern themselves about their salvation? But let us examine this theory a

What is salvation? It is used in the New Testament in two senses. Sometimes it refers to conversion and the forgiveness of sins-the turning of a man's face in the right direction and bringing him in right relations to God, in which he receives the forgiveness of sins and the hope of life eternal. Another and larger meaning of the word is the complete restoration of man to the image of Christ, who is the image of God. In this last sense salvation means character. Has man nothing to do in the formation of a character that is Christ-like? Must be not co-operate with God who works in him both to will and to do his good pleasure? Must he not, by 'giving all diligence," add to his "faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly love, and to brotherly love charity," or universal love? The Apostle Peter seemed to think that this process is one that requires diligent effort on the part of believers. Of course, the passage referred to was addressed to Christians who were saved in the sense of having been forgiven and "born again," but they were yet to work out, in co operation with God, that larger salvation which means character transformed into the image of Christ.

But is it true that, even in the matter of conversion and the forgiveness of sins, man is wholly passive, and may be saved while in a state of resistance to God? By no means. The New Testament teaches exactly the contrary. It is, of course, a Christian truism that man can do nothing to merit his salvation or to earn it. God has provided the means of our salvation, and through the death of Christ has opened up the way of pardon and reconciliation. In this man had nothing to do. But these provisions baving been made for man's salvation, he is now invited to accept the offer of salvation on God's terms. This he must do or remain unsaved. The New England boy would have shown himself a much better theologian, though not near so good a Calvinist, if, when asked as to his share in his salvation, he had replied, "Jesus Christ, who loved me and gave Himself for me, offered to save me if I would accept Him as my Savior, and I have accepted Him." According to the New Testament those who accepted the offer of salvation through Christ are said to have believed on Him with a faith so earnest and active that they turned away from their sins and submitted to Jesus Christ in the initial act of baptism. Only those who so accepted Christ are spoken of as among the "saved" in the New Testament.

One or two passages of Scripture will suffice to show how the theory of conversion advocated by the Sunday-school Times antagonizes the teaching of the New Testament. In Peter's address on the day of Pentecost, we are told, after the outline of his sermon, that "with many other words he testified, and exhorted them, saying, Save yourselves from this crooked generation." It is evident that if Peter had held the view of salvation which the editor of the Sundayschool Times holds he never would have given this exhortation. We are further told that "they then that received his word were baptized, and there were added unto them in that day about three thousand souls." Lest Peter's orthodoxy should be called in question, as is sometimes done, let us go back to the Master Himself. To the hard-hearted and stubborn Jews he said, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." Again: "How oft would I have gathered you together, even as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, but ye would not." Does this not indicate that there is something for man to do in order to enjoy the salvation which Christ offers to the world? Does it not show beyond cavil that he saves no man against his will? Is not the Lord waiting even now patiently, while seeking to win men to Him, for them to admit Him into their hearts? "Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come unto him, and will sup with him, and he with me."

But why quote isolated texts of Scripture when the whole trend of the New Testament is in the same direction? The very nature of man, his creation in the image of God, implies his freedom in accepting or rejecting the gospel. God respects the volition with which He has endowed man. He offers salvation to men but they must accept it on the terms He names, and then co-operate with Him in working it out in its perfection and glory. Do we need any further explanation of the moral and spiritual paralysis with which some of the great religious bodies seem to be afflicted in relation to growth and aggressiveness, than the prevalence of such a theory of man's irresponsibility in the matter of his salvation? What is needed is such a solemn emphasis of man's responsibility as will make men feel that their condemnation is just if they refuse to accept the great salvation which is "of grace," but "through faith"-a loving and obedient faith, which unites the soul to Christ and holds it in everlasting loyalty to

"CHRISTIANITY IN THE NINE-TEENTH CENTURY."*

Among the notable books which have been issued and will, no doubt, be issued, dealing with the progress of the century now closing, is the recent volume whose title is placed at the head of this article. Dr. Lorimer has done the cause of our common Christianity distinguished service in this contribution on the progress of Christianity within the nineteenth century.

Christianity is first exhibited as it existed in the dusk of the eighteenth century and the dawn of the nineteenth. This furnishes the background for the history of the century. When religious life seemed to be at its lowest ebb, hope sprang out of darkness in the formation of the "Godly Club" among the students of Oxford and the rise of the great movement of Methodism under the labors of John Wesley, Whitefield and others. The influence of this movement extended to the United States and the great revival spread through New England under Jonathan Edwards and others.

The chapter on "The Human Element in the Progress of a Divine Religion" is one of the most thoughtful and suggestive in the book. The history of Christianity in the world cannot be understood without recognizing both the human and the divine elements in it. "Why should theologies, modes of worship, implements of spiritual husbandry and systems of Sunday-school instruction be retained when they have outgrown their usefulness and are no longer fit to render religion operative or to enable her to fulfill her mission in the world? What our fathers have done, why, if the same necessity exists, should not we do, and do it without hesitancy and without apology? The human element has been incorporated into Christianity for just such purposes. It has no place there at all if it has not the right to free religion from incrustations that impede its activity and to supply it with the most important weapons for its world wide conquests." Our own religious movement had its origin in this conception of Christian liberty and well would it have been for us if, at all stages of our progress, this conception had more universally prevailed.

"The Mediæval and the Modern" is the title of the chapter that deals with the renaissance of Roman Catholicism in the "Oxford Movement," which, in its earlier stage, was known as the "Tractarian Movement." The causes and the results of this revival of Roman Catholicism in England are treated very fully and ably. The extent and significance of that upheaval in the religious life of Eagland we should say are imperfectly apprehended by the average reader of history. Its influence on the Church of England was most decided, and continues to this day in the Romeward tendency of the High Church branch of the Establishment.

^{*}Christianity in the Nineteenth Century (The Boston-Lowell Lectures, 1900.) By George C. Lorim-r, Minister at Tremont Temple, Boston. The Griffith and Rowland Press. 1900.

Under the title of the "New Prophetism in Modern Literature" the author deals with the religious quality of certain authors and books which have been influential in molding the religious life of the century. The prophetic office which properly belongs to the preachers of to-day, he judges has been taken up largely by modern literature which deals with the religious life of the times with a boldness and freedom which is not always found in the pulpit. The chapter presents a very vigorous, and, as it seems to us, for the most part, a very intelligent criticism of the poets and prose authors of the century in their bearings on the Christian religion.

"The Church and Society" is another problem that is dealt with. The spirit of this chapter may be seen from the following quotation:

"I am aware that His Grace of Peterborough has recently decided that society could not be constructed on the principles of the Sermon on the Mount; but I must crave indulgence to attach more importance to the testimony of Christ than to that of a bishop, who probably was conscious, when he spoke, of the insuperable difficulty that exists in harmonizing the assumptions of a hierarchy with that view of social order which begins with the non-ecclesiastical beatitude, 'Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' It seems irreverent to place our Savior and His apostles in the position of solemn triflers, amusing the world with impracticable and hazy notions of virtues and bless ings which, the longer they are sought, fade away the more into the incoherent and intangible."

In what our author says on "The Bible and Criticism" he no doubt lays himself open to criticism from the extreme conservatives among his own and other religious bodies. But the entire chapter seems to us to be marked by great sanity of judgment and great reverence for the Bible. There is a frank recognition of the changed view of inspiration and revelation, brought about by modern criticism, and the author has no difficulty in seeing great gain . to Christianity in this changed view. While this part of the work may prove too liberal for the extremely conservative, it is sure to prove too conservative for the extremely liberal. The author is a staunch believer in the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures and in the Golhood and Lordship of Jesus Christ.

In his able treatment of the subject of "The Regeneration and Development" he makes a further statement of the changes which have been wrought in theological thought. We cannot refrain from quoting a single sentence: "The makers of theology are being compelled to make the Savior, not sentimentally, but scientifically, the center of their systems; and as mankind opens its eyes to what is taking place and perceives that metaphysical speculations are being relegated to the shadowy background and that Jesus is being brought more and more to the fron, love springs up in its heart; and as more will be undertaken when inspired by love for a person than by veneration for a creed, the prospects are that the church is just on the eve of her noblest enterprises and her grandest victories." In this pregnant sentence our readers will recognize a truth with which they are familiar, and one which may be said to be most fundamental in the movement which we are urging. When Dr. Lorimer adds to the above the statement that "when theology itself has ultimately been transformed by the love of Christ, and has rid itself of its traditional garments, has completely abandoned ancient prejudices, and has determined to fashion its judgment in harmony with his teachings, then shall the church herself be transformed by love, and then her touch of love shall transform the world"-he puts himself pretty squarely on the true ground of religious reformation.

The "Isms and Schisms" is a fit and striking characterization of modern substitutes for Christianity. Perhaps the chapter that will awaken greatest interest among most readers is that on "The Movement for the Restoration of Primitive Christian Union." After correcting what the author thinks is an exaggerated statement of the divisions among us, based on the census, and pointing out how naturally many of these leading denominations had their origin, Dr. Lorimer makes it plain that his sympathies are in favor of the movement for Christian unity. By this he does not mean an ecclesiasticism, but such a unity among the followers of Christ as would enable them to co-operate as brethren in the regeneration of society and the conversion of the world. His reference to the religious movement of the Disciples is brief but courteous. We could have wished, having testified frankly to the good influence of their plea in favor of Christian union and against divisions, he might have given a brief statement at least of the method by which they propose to bring about such a union. We may have occasion hereafter, however, to advert to this feature of the book. The author's conception of union is not unlike our own. He is not anticipating any scheme for producing uniformity of thought, or of methods of worship or forms of administration, and much less a colossal ecclesiasticism. For the present his advice is that "all Christians federate their churches and let them press forward to conquer the world for Christ, and by and by, after the smoke of successful battle shall clear away, they probably will perceive that the creeds which now seem irreconcilably opposed have in them much in common and not enough of difference to warrant the perpetuation of sectarian names."

The chapters on 'The Nations and Religion' and "The Obstructions and Oppositions" deal with some later history and with events some of which are too close to us for their stupendous significance to be understood. We imagine that if the author should revise his work ten years hence, he would give a different interpretation to some of the remarkable events in our own recent national history. The book closes with a chapter on 'The Past and Future," which, while pointing out the evils that threaten the church, gives, nevertheless, a hopeful and inspiring outlook for the future.

On the whole, we have read few books covering so wide a range of thought and discussing so many topics in which we have found so little that we could not endorse. The book indicates scholarly research, sober thought, wise judgment, a thoroughly evangelical faith, a liberal mind, a prophetic spirit, and we shall be glad to know that it has received the generous recognition on the part of the public which its merits deserve.

MINISTERIAL RELIEF.

(Phil. 4:14-19).

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic. Dec. 19.)

CENTRAL TRUTH:—It is both a high privilege and a sacred duty that the church should minister to the needs of its faithful servants who are in affliction and want.

The Philippian letter is a classic on the humanities and the courtesies of life. While it touches some of the loftiest peaks of theology it deals in the main with those sweet and holy relationships which grow out of the Christian life, and the duties and obligations which spring from these relations. Nothing can exceed the grace with which it defines the relation of the preacher to the flock he serves or has served in the past.

Paul is a prisoner in Rome. He was the founder, along with Silas, Timothy and Luke, of the church at Philippi. While there he had suffered affliction by stripes and imprisonment. This suffering had only endeared him to the church. They learn of his imprisonment in Rome and determine to minister to his needs. To do this the more effectually they sent not only their gifts, but many loving messages by the hand of th ful minister, Epaphroditus. It is in acknowledgment of this visit and of these gifts that he writes, in the passage which constitutes the lesson for the hour.

of this ministration The effect on the part of the church is indicated by the remark of the apostle, who tells them in this letter, "I rejoice in the Lord greatly, that now at length ye have revived your thought for me; wherein ye did indeed take thought, but ye lacked opportunity." It was not so much that he was in dire need, but what rejoiced his heart most was that he was not forgotten by those whom he had served at the peril of his life; that they had revived their thought of him. Is this not most pathetic? Perhaps there is no harder burden for the aged or the disabled minister of the gospel to bear than the feeling that he has been forgotten by his brethren for whom he has labored in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. Perhaps some of them owe all they have, and all they hope to be in the life to come, to his faithful preaching of the word; and yet he is desolate, lonely and in want, and there is no Epaphroditus to visit him with loving messages and tender gifts as the proofs of their love.

Paul might have been able to get on without their gifts, for his wants were very few. "Howbeit," he adds, "ge did well, that ye hal fellowship with my affliction." Yes, they "did well," not only for the apostle's sake, but for their own happiness and selfrespect as well. No doubt they were benefixed more than Paul by the consciousness that they had not only relieved his want, but comforted his heart and cheered him in his lonely hours. This is what the apostle means when he tells them, after referring to other generous gifts from them in the past, "Not that I seek for the gift; but I seek for the fruit that increaseth to your account." It was for the benefit that would accous to them rather than to himself that he rejoiced in this evidence of their generous thought for him.

Moreover, the apostle tells them that the things that came from them through Epaphroditus were "an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God." Not only, then, was Paul's heart rejoiced and the church at Philippi enriched, but God was well pleased at this sacrifice of love. Surely this three-fold reward ought to inspire great liberality in the churches toward the aged and destitute ministers of the gospel, who are no longer able through disease or the infirmities of age, to minister to their own necessities. But here is a still furtner promise, as if every possible motive should be urged upon the church to cause it to fulfill this sacred obligation: "And my God shall fulfill every need of yours according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus." What more could any one ask than this?

During the present month the churches are called upon to make an offering to the Ministerial Relief Fund; or in the language of Paul, to have "fellowship" with the aged and needy ministers in their "affliction," in order that the hearts of these servants may rejoice that the thought of them has been "revived," in order that their wants may be supplied, that fruit may abound unto the account of the churches, and that God may be well pleased. Let this obligation be met in such a spirit as will call down the blessings of Him who "shall fulfill every need of yours according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus." The season of the year is now here when their wants are most urgent, and our gifts should be correspondingly generous. May we all have fellows ip with these faithful ones in their affliction!

PRAYER.

O God, our Fa her, we thank Thee for the riches of Thy grace which Thou has showered upon us abundantly through the poverty of Thy Son and our Savior who, though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor that we might be rich. We thank Thee, too, for those faithful servan's of Thine who, in their love for Thee and Thy cause and for their fellowmen, preferred poverty to riches if so they might extend the knowledge of Toy salvation among men. Many of these yet survive among us and some of them are dependent upon the generosity of the churches to save them from want and discouragement. May it be a joy to us to minister to their necessities, and to comfort their hearts while they are yet with us! May we thus have fellowship in their affliction and fellowship with Him through whose poverty we have been made rich. In His name. Amen!

To-day the first white flakes of snow we have seen this season are floating down through the air, intermingled with rain. It is a sort of contest between autumn and winter, in which the latter is likely to get the worst of it in this, the first round. But every one knows that these few white crystals that melt as they fall to-day are the prophecy of winter's stealthy approach, and of his supremacy throughout this zone, for a season. It is expected, provided for and by most people will be welcomed. It has decided advantages for those who prepare them elves to make the best use of them. It is the opportunity for cultivating the indoor life. Every home should be supplied with good books and papers-the very best that can be ob ained-and, if there be children in the home, old or young, there should be games of some innocent and interesting sort. The old folks must not be disturbed too easily by the noise of youthful frolics and fun. The home in which music and laughter and good cheer abound, and where books, magazines and papers are regarded as a necessary part of its equipment, is not the home from which the boys and girls are anxious to escape; and even when duty at last calls them to leave the parental roof they look back to it with swelling hearts and with fond recollections through all the coming years. Into the ears of parents we would whisper this word of advice and caution: In getting ready for winter, do not forget the hungry minds and hearts of the young people and little children. Plan to make the home so interesting, so full of the spirit of good fellowship, that it will be the dearest spot on earth to those who call it home.

Apropos of the thought of children's going out from their old home to establish homes of their own, which is the law of nature and of God, and of their carrying with them, and holding as a perpetual legacy, pleasant memories of the life under the old rooftree, it occurs to us to remark that the "old folks at home" have an investment in memorg, too, with which they would not like to part. When all the children have married and gone away, and the old home becomes still-0, so still!-how memory recalls the patter of little feet, the chatter of little voices, and follows on down the shining years when they left us for the college! Can we ever forget that day? And then there were the home returnings, and the little whileso brief-in which they mingled their young lives with ours and filled the home with the joy of their presence, and then-well, it was with them as it was with us, and with our fathers and mothers before us-they felt the power of other attractions, mated and left the old home nest to build new ones for themselves. "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," while human nature remains what it is. But what a source of pleasure does memory become to us in those inevitable days of loneliness, if we can have the consciousness that while they were yet with us we sought to make home, even if it were humble, the brightest place in the world to them, and to fill it with such an at nosphere of love, of cheerfulness and of unaffected piety as would be most favorable for the development of all that was pure and noble and Godlike in their natures. To some of our readers this experience has passed into history, while to others it remains to be wrought out in the years to come. Let us hope the latter class, especially, may be helped by these reflections.

We had the privilege, recently, of hearing an address by Rev. Charles Sheldon, author of "In His Steps" and several other works of wide circulation. The part of his address which touched us most and in the deepest part of our nature was that in which he told us how we could make our homes better. He described his home in one of the Dakotas. His father was a minister with a small salary in that new country, and the home was very unpretentious. He told of how the snow in winter was so deep that the only way they could find the barn to feed the stock was by having a rope tied to the barn and reaching to the little dwelling and tunneling through the snow, guided by that rope. But inside the humble home there were books, music, games and, above all, there was love. At some time in the evening other books were laid aside and a lesson was read from the Book of books by his father who, then, as they all bowed, commended them to God's care and protection. But the last thing before retiring was a game and a romp in which they all engaged. Home was everything to them. They had no place else to which they could go. And so they made the most of hone. As the speaker told of those boyhood days with its hardships, but with its home love and brightness, his eyes grew moist with the tender memories. Is it any wonder that a man like Charles M. Sheldon should come out of such a home as that? Compare it, contrast it rather, with many so-called homes, filled with the spirit of pride, worldliness and fashion, from which reverence and piety have been expelled and even parental and filial affection are neutralized by the claims of society! Shall we not resolve to protect our homes as oases in the desert of worldly strife and turmoil where we may rest and be restored and from which our children may go forth with a chance to win in life's battles?

We call very special attention to the address of Bro. J. S. Lamar, the first part of which was published in our last issue, and which is completed in this number. We trust no one will allow the length of this address to prevent him from reading it entire. It has a present relevancy which makes it very valuable. It has the advantage, too, of being fine thought expressed in fine English. That lesson which Elijah learned at the mouth of the cave is one which needs to be taught to every generation. Give the whole address the thoughtful reading which its honored author and its intrinsic value deserve.

THE BEQUESTS OF THE NINE-TEENTH CENTURY TO THE TWENTIETH.

BY W. H. BAGBY.

"And they offered great sacrifices that day, and rejoiced; for God had made them rej ice with great joy; and the women also and the children rejoiced; so that t'e joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off."—Neh. 12:43.

If the completion of such a work as the restoration of the wall about the city of Jerusalem could inspire such joy and thanksgiving, how unspeakable should be the joy and gratitude born of the completion of such a century as the one to which we must soon say good-bye forever! What a mighty century it has been! What a page it has added to the history of time! What a note it has struck in the anthem of the ages! What a stride it represents in the march of improvement! What a mountain chain of mighty achievements stretches back over the shining path of its progress! What a contribution it has made to the sum total of human achievement! What problems have been solved! What mysteries have been revealed! What feats have been performed! What depths have been sounded! What heights have been scaled! The mind staggers under the very burden of them. A recent speaker in Brooklyn thus summarizes several important achievements of this century:

The century received from its predecessors the horse, we bequeath the bicycle, the locomotive, and automobile. We received the goose quill, and bequeath the typewriter; we received the scythe, we bequeath the mowing machine; we received the sickle, we bequeath the harvester; we received the hand printing press, we bequeath the Hoe cylinder press; we received gunpowder, we bequeath nitroglycerine; we received the tallowdip, we bequeath the arc light; we received the galvanic battery, we bequeath the dynamo; | we received the flint-lock, we bequeath automatic firing Maxim guns; we received the sailing-ship, we bequeath the steamship, the greyhound of the sea; we received the Constitution, we bequeath the battleship Oregon; we received the beacon signal fire, we bequeath the telephone and wireless telegraphy; we received wood and stone for structures, we bequeath 20-storied sky-scrapers of steel.

To this we may add, we received the tinder box, and bequeath the parlor match; we received the wooden mole-board plow, and bequeath the steam plow; we received the needle, and bequeath the sewing machine; we received the lumbering stage-coach, and bequeath the vestibuled train. And so I might go on indefinitely, enumerating the improvements that have been made in comparatively small things during the 19th century. But I desire to direct your attention to the greater and more abiding things for which we should be grateful, not only to-day, but every day and hour of our lives.

The 20th century received from its predecessor the district school, with all its punitive paraphernalia, and its primitive provisions for implanting in the minds of precocious youths the rudiments of "Reading, 'Riting and 'Rithmetic," we bequeath to the 20th century our splendid public schools, which are supposed, in the space of a few brief years, to successfully cram into the craniums of capable children a curriculum covering almost all branches of learning. In spite of their defects, our common schools have been a great blessing to the 19th century, and are destined to be a still greater blessing to the 20th; for a part of the work of the 20th century will be to correct the things that need correcting in our public school system, which has taken too deep root in the affections of the American people to ever be uprooted. While we continue to believe that the public school is the foundation upon which must rest general education; and while we continue to believe in education as the chief defense of the nation and a better safeguard of liberty than a standing army, we will never part with the public school.

The 19th century received from its predecessor a government being rapidly driven toward the rock of dismemberment; we bequeath a people bound together in that closest, strongest, most sacred and most enduring union, the union that comes after the fierce fires of passion and hate have been extinguished in blood and tears—a people whose united prayer is:

"Lord of the Universe, shield us and guide us;
Trusting Thee always, through shadow and sun!
Thou hast united us, who shall divide us?
Keep us, O keep us, the many in one!
Up with our banner bright,
Sprinkled with starry light,
Spread its fair emblems from mountain to shore,
While through the sounding sky,
Loud rings the Nation's cry—
Union and liberty! One evermore!"

The 19th century received from its predecessor a self-centered nation; we bequeath to the 20th century a people whose eyes have been providentially opened to their obligation to follow God in his march to the liberation, civilization and evangelization of the rest of the world that needs these "There Said Phillips Brooks: things. are men who cannot know of a need in all the world without its taking the shape of a personal appeal to them." was the presence of so many men like that in the United States of America that forced our government to strike the hand of oppression from suffering, starving Cuba. The middle wall of partition broken down by Christ must not be replaced by the boundary lines of nations. The bond that binds all men in one common brotherhood must never be cut through by the boundary line of a state. Men are citizens of different nations by the accident of birth, they are brothers by the sacrifice of the Son of God. The ocean itself is not wide enough nor deep enough to keep apart two souls that would join hands to help their fellow men. If two individuals can join hands to help humanity, two nations may, for men are brothers first. In the light of this fact, who could find fault with these noble words of Canon Farrar: "O friends, brothers beyond the sea, never more be the words of strife or batred uttered between us! Let all those common sympathies which make us weep when you weep, and rejoice when you rejoice, be an alliance sealed between us and for our children, till time shall be no more-an alliance between Christian citizens against a crushing preponderance of military despotism-an all ance for the people's progress, for the blessing and evangelization of mankind." The nation that proposes to stand still within its own boundary lines and see the salvation of the Lord, loses sight of its own safety and of its true mission in the world. No more than an individual can a nation reply, "Am I my brother's keeper?" No nation can live for itself and live for God. God has something nobler for every nation to do than to bask in the sunlight of its own peace and prosperity. The neighbor of the individual is the neighbor of the nation, and the duty of the one is the duty of the other. The Christian nation must do what the Christian individual is called upon to do-follow God as he marches on.

There may be some who dream of empire as they follow the leadings of the Lord. If they do it is no more than the disciples of Jesus did. The larger and truer vision will come to these as it came to those. God's work cannot wait for men to develop perfect visions and perfect lives. Often the clear revelation comes only with the completed revolution. Prophecy is seldom understood until after it has been fulfilled. Jesus had gone back to heaven before many of his sayings were clearly understood by his disciples. Yet Christ could and did use them in spite of their erroneous notions and unworthy motives. God can and does make blows struck for self count for the salvation of others. The motive, if it be a bad one, counts against the actor, but the act. if it be a good one, counts for God. In the days of Paul some preached Christ through envy and strife, and to add to his bonds. He thanked God, not that Christ was preached through envy and strife, but that Christ was preached. "He causeth the wrath of men to praise him." The selling of Joseph was a great sin, but it saved Israel. The crucifixion of Christ was a great crime, but it saved the world. If empire be our motive for sending soldiers and ships to the islands of the sea, the motive is greatly to our discredit: but if, as the result of our act, be it immediate or remote, the shackles shall be struck from the bodies and the minds and the souls of the inhabitants thereof, and the kingdom of God thus furthered, the act will be to the glory of Christ, and future generations will thank God that Stepped over the line to the isles of the sea And made them the homes of the brave and the free.

The 19th century received from its predecessor the embryotic Sunday-school with its mixed instruction, its meager equipment and its primitive methods; it bequeaths to the 20th the mightiest movement the world has seen since the Church was born—the organized movement to save the children to Christ. One of the greatest discoveries the Church ever made was when she discovered that the Bible is the best seed, that childhood is the best seedtime, and that the child heart is the best soil in which that seed can be sown. If we had nothing else to be thankful for but the discovery of these things, we should have enough to inspire an anthem of praise that would 6nd an echo in the corridors of heaven. But once did ever the choir of heaven come to earth to sing, and that was when a child was born; and the songthey sang was a song of hope and praise. The aged Simeon looked upon a little child and thanked God that his eyes had been permitted to behold the salvation of The scene and the saying were Israel. prophetic. The Church to-day looks upon childhood and beholds the hope and the salvation of the true Israel of God. In childhood she finds the field that is indeed white unto the harvest. No wonder that millions of money and multitudes of men and women are being given by the Church to childhood -to the sowing and the reaping in this most fruitful of all fields.

The 19th century received from its predecessor the youth of the Church, silentlipped and empty-handed; it bequeaths to the 20 h the Y. P. S. C. E., Epworth League and kindred organizations, millions strong, with the open Bible in their hands and the love of Christ in their hearts. Strong in the strength of Christ, their Leader, and buoyant with the hopefulness of youth, they have given a new impetus to the kingdom of God on earth. Trusting in God for strength, studying his word for light, looking to Jesus for leadership, they are a veritable Gideon's band, marching forth to victory.

The 19th century received from its predecessor the womanhood of the Church with her hands bound with silken cords, and a ban upon her lips; it gives to the 20th Christian womanhood, freed from bond and ban, loving-hearted and gentle-handed, organized to bring relief to suffering, to lift up the fallen, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to bind up the bruised in body and heart, to provide help for the helpless and homeless, and to proclaim to a lost and ruined race the acceptable year of the Lord.

"Through court, and through mart, and through college,

The grand truth is working at length.
There's a purity wiser than knowledge,
There's a righteousness stronger than strength.

"And though pride unto pride hath erected
The temple of state and the tower,
God again, what the builders rejected,
Uplifted in honor and power."

The 19th century received the Bible in limited editions and few languages, we bequeath it published by the millions and in multitudes of languages, read, believed and loved by more people than ever before in the history of the world.

We received a missionary zeal just beginning to struggle into life, we bequeath the mightiest missionary impulse the Church has known since the days of the apostles. It is not an impulse born of a fiery zeal that would take the world by storm, but one that is born of a quiet determination to take the world for Christ if it takes ten thousand years.

In addition to these things, for the possession of which we should be profoundly grateful to Almighty God, I must mention the faith, the hope, the love and the life that will abide when temporal things shall be no more. It is a good thing to be thankful for material prosperity, but it is a vastly better thing to be able to be joyful, contented and thankful though destitute of temporal blessings. The very best thing within the power of a human being to grasp in this life is the ability to say with Paul, cold and hungry in his dungeon at Rome, "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content. . . . I have learned the secret both to be filled and to be hungry, both to abound and to be in want." If he had no food and drink for the body, he did have the bread from heaven, and the water of life for the soul; if he had naught but rags for his body he rejoiced in the possession of the robe of righteousness; if his earthly friends had deserted him, he still had left the best of Friend; if he had no hope in this life, he still had hope in the life to come; if he had no home on earth, he did have the precious promise of Him for whose sake he had given up all things earthly, "In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you!" These tenderly beautiful lines, in the negro dialect, by Paul Laurence Dunbar, breathe of the hope and the home that abide:

"It's moughty tiabsome layin' roun' Dis sorrer laden earfly groun' Ao' oftent mes I think, thinks I, 'Twould be a sweet t'ing des to die, An' go 'long home.

"Home whath de frien's I loved 'll say, We've waited fu' you may a day, Come hyeah a' ree' yo'se'f, an' know You's d'ne wid sorrer an' wid woe, Now you's at home.

"I wish de day was neah at han'
I's tiahed of dis grieven lan',
I's tiahed of de lonely yeahs,
I want to des dry up my teahs,
An' go 'long home.

"O, Mastah, won't you sen' de call?
My frien's is daih, my hope, my all,
I's waitin' whaih de road is rough,
I want to byeah you say, 'Enough,
Ol' man, come home!"

CHURCH ORGANIZATION A GROWTH.

J. J. HALEY.

The church is not a piece of mechanism; it is not the plan and specifications of an infallible architect worked out and put together by inspired builders; it is not a house that was built, but a tree that grew; not a sudden creation or instantaneous revelation, but a gradual evolution; not an organization in the beginning at all, but a family or society of believers of the simplest possible type.

Christ did not form an ecclesiastical organization, nor did he authorize any one else to create such an institution. He submitted no rules and left no regulations for church government. Neither Christ nor the Apostles formulated a creed. There was no theological system in their preaching, nor is there any in the New Testament. They prepared no ritual and left no liturgy for the use of the churches. There was no professional officialism or clericalism or priestcraft in the early church. No offices were created except the Apostolate and no officers were appointed except the Apostles till circumstances rendered some kind of organization absolutely necessary. When and where the eldership began we have yet to learn.

There were three forms of organization current in the first century, all which, at different times and places, seem to have been made use of by the developing church, the Jewish, the Greek and the Roman. The Jewish organization was a kind of oligarchy. The elders or older men came by a seemingly natural prescription to exercise authority in the village and in the synagogue. The Jewish Christian church was clearly modeled after the synagogue, hence its superintendence by old men, its eldership rule. Greece on the other hand was a democracy. It had passed under monarchical rule in the time of Jesus, but retained its democratic spirit. Where Christians were mainly gathered out of Greek communities they took on the Greek form of organization. The election of seven deacons mentioned in the sixth chapter of Acts was the first concession to Greek demogracy. In Rome the organization was imperialistic and monarchical; it was highly articulated and centralized. government was administered on military principles; it was centered in one man in a city, one man in each province, and finally one man over all, the Emperor, who was commander in-chief of the Empire. Where the church was made up of Romans the church took on the imperial stic form of organization, ending with the Pope in place of Cæsar, and a great centralized spiritual monarchy in place of the Empire.

Thus the political and traditional environment of the communities has more to do with the form of church organization than spiritual considerations or specific scriptural authority. This flexibility of forms, and a margin for liberty and growth in the use of externals, renders the church adaptable to nations and countries in every stage of political and social evolution. The Mohammedan conception of revelation that makes it a set of unchangeable mechanical rules to be inflexibly applied according to a hard and fast interpretation of the letter, would make Christianity like Mohammedanism incapable of world expansion, reformation when corrupted, or any species of growth.

There are three periods in all organized religious movements, the Creative, the Interpretative, and the Constructive; first created, then interpreted then organized. First the creative personality, the initiating genius, who is founder and father of the religion. Then a man almost as great to interpret him, to adopt and apply his principles to human need. The third man is the constructive genius who organizes the movement into a permanent form. Moses was the creative personality of Judaism. The prophets were his interpreters and preachers. Later Judaism after the captivity was the constructive period in the history of that religion, and Ezra was the organizing genius. Christ was the creative and initiative personality of Christianity. Paul and John were his great interpreters. The Roman period was the period of construction and organization. This order of creation, interpretation, and construction shows revelation to be progressive and the church a development. The first and second periods, that is the periods of initiation, interpretation and the first application of principles, are always the times of greatest purity. Corruption and stagnation, and crystallization, always set in in the third period, and this creates the necessity of going back to the founder and his first interpreters, to get a new standpoint and a new impulse for the reformation of abuses.

The lesson from these conclusions is obvious. No particular form of church government is fundamental or essential to the existence and perpetuity of the Christian religion. One form of ecclesiastical administration may be better than another, may suit the genius of the gospel better, may be more useful and fruitful of good results, may be more easily adjusted to the few fragments of knowledge we possess derived from Holy Scripture, but none of them are exclusively or wholly inspired. In future schemes and discussions of Christian union all forms of church organization that can not be positively shown to contravene a truth or truths fundamental to Christianity, must be placed in the category of toleration, and not elevated to the sphere of things essential. If the religious denominations of the 20th century are to attain and maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace, there must be mutual concession and toleration in matters external and incidental. The refusal of denominational bodies to recognize, fraterniz, and co operate with each other on the ground of differences of opinion and practice regarding doctrines of the ministry and church organization, will be interpreted as a sign that they are dominated more by the spirit of mediæval bigotry than by that of Jesus Christ and his Apostles.

B. B. TYLER'S LETTER.

The writer of the letter which I, in this manner, pass on to you said: "Please consider this letter private. I want truth not press notice." I do not think that this injunction is violated when every trace of the writer is erased. The question raised is a real question in the minds of some. It is not a new question. Alexander Campbell discussed it and arrived at a conclusion; other able men have discussed it. problem is difficult. Possibly it cannot be solved. The difficulty is sufficiently great to warrant me in placing the following. statement of it in your hands with a request that you attempt its solution. Shall I hear from you? Now read with care, and without passion or prejudice, the following:

B B. TYLER, Denver, Col.,

DEAR BRO TYLER:—All my Christian life I've been associated with the "Disciples," but I am much dissatisfied with what seems to be a denominational spirit among "our people." I have been thinking I thoroughly understood "our plea" and "our creed." I am either in error or its application is perverted.

I notice with pleasure your words in current EVANGELIST, page 1351. "Any one who loves the Christ and strives to follow him is my brother... The bond of fellowship is a common devotion to the one Lord and not of agreement in doctrinal or political views." In perfect harmony with this are the words of Alexander Campbell: "I should never force what may be a conclusion of my mind upon the religious practice of others." It seems to me that both statements are violated among "our people." Two cases in point:

1. An affusionist offered himself for membership. He was satisfied that his sprinkling an swered every condition of mind with him that immersion could. His wife and children were members there. He wanted to be recognized as a Christian and have his "church home" there. They refused to give the "right hand of fellowship" without his immersion. I think their action made the "bond of fellowship" not simply "a common devotion to the one Lord" but also "an agreement of certain doctrinal views." Immersion was a test of fellowship. They wanted to "force a conclusion of their minds upon him" as a condition of local church membership. Your statement and that of Mr. Campbell would welcome him upon his Christian character. It would not endorse his affusion nor discriminate against him on account of it. Mr. C. also says that "joint participation in any act does not mean approbation of other doctrines not held in common." Why can't it apply to our usual "giving right hand of fellowship?"

2. Recently there died a doctor of note, a Methodist, sprinkled and of unusual Christian character. At our next prayer-meeting a sister, an intimate acquaintance of the doctor, was eulogizing him almost extravagantly. I asked her this: "Supposing the doctor when living had moved into our vicinity, and knowing you and others and enjoying our company, had said to the congregation: 'I greatly enjoy the worship and social life here and as this is my home I would like to be recognized as a brother and be counted as one of your members,' would you give him 'the hand of fellewship?" "No." "Why?" "He would have to be immersed." She recognized his "common devotion," etc., lauded his character, but made certain "doctrinal agreement" a necessary condition of "local church membership," I cannot make it consist with your statement nor that of Mr. C. nor "our plea."

Does it not really set a denominational line, and so become divisive, sectarian? And yet we boast to the world that we are undenominational and the enemies of sectarianism.

Permit a few questions:

- 1. Is there any authority for receiving, admitting, dismissing or excluding "congregationally" in any formal or legal sense? If it is not an essential, why use it at all?
- 2. We place no restriction at the Lord's table. All Christians who deem themselves worthy partake; unless the same are immersed we refuse to receive them or in any way account them members. We stand against "close communion," yet do we not practice "close fellowship?" We recognize them as Christians and participate in almost every act of worship, yet shut them out of our "membership."
- 3. We grant letters of "good standing and full fellowship." Is immersion absolutely necessary to full fellowship?
- 4. An effort was made to unite one of our congregations with one of the Congregationalists. We encountered opposition. In what way could we have effected the union with the approval of "our people?"

I am happy to consider myself your brother and a disciple of the Great Teacher.

Let the difficulty so cogently presented above be carried a little farther. Suppose the pious doctor to whom my correspondent refers had been a Quaker would he have been in favor of giving to him "the right hand of Christian fellowship?" The devout Quaker has not been immersed in water, nor has he had water sprinkled or poured on him, but his daily life is Christian. Why not receive him by "the right hand of fellowship?" Probably no man in New England had a gentler, purer, sweeter, more Christly character in its daily and hourly manifestations than had Ralph Waldo Emerson. Suppose that he had moved into your neighborhood or into the neighborhood of your congregation and had said, as the pious Methodist doctor is supposed to have spoken in the foregoing communication: "I greatly enjoy the worship and social life here, and as this is my home I would like to be received as a brother," would you give him "the right hand of fellowship?"

Even the Methodist is narrow on the subject of baptism. He says: "Here are three modes of baptism; take your chice." An applicant replies: "I have looked into the subject and there is a fourth mode which I prefer to either of the three customary modes, will you baptize me in this fourth possible way and receive me into the fellowship of your church?" Certainly not! You will accept one of the three modes that we have decided to be valid or you cannot receive from us "the right hand of fellowship." Or one says: "I do not see that water baptism in any form is essential. I have received the baptism of the Holy Spirit. I am satisfied with that-will you receive me?" The Methodist is compelled to reply: "No, we cannot receive you into 'full fellowship' in our church without a baptism in or with water."

But why speak of these possible cases? To show that the difficulty mentioned by my correspondent is not confined to the Disciples. The problem is much larger than the letter quoted above presents it. It is, in some respects, different with the Disciples of Christ, but the limitation of membership in the church is a problem, or easily may be, in the local congregations in all denominations.

You recall "the half-way covenant" in New England in the eighteenth century. Its results were disastrous in the extreme. Those who advocated it intended good; but the result was evil. A revival of spiritual life swept "the half-way covenant" out of existence.

"Preach the word." This is safe. Preach the gospel honestly and fully as you understand it. There is no other way for a man of convictions. Speak out clearly, in a spirit of charity, the way of life as you read it in the New Testament. Do not pause to inquire how some other man understands or presents it. To God you are responsible. The Head of the body, Jesus Christ, our Lord, says to his disciples, "Preach the gospel." This every man must do as he understands the message. Do not even pause to inquire how the Disciples usually understand and proclaim the glad tidings.

I have not attempted to reply to the questions presented. Let the problem be fully stated in the first place.

Preserve this letter. The Lord willing, I will have something to say on this subject next week. Meantime, let me hear from you. What is your answer to the queries presented? What do you say when a pious unimmersed person desires to be received into full fellowship in your congregation? Let us compare notes. Good, I am sure, will result. The Lord give to us the spirit of wisdom and understanding. Above all, may we have the charity so highly commended in the New Tes ament—the charity that covers a multitude of errors, both of understanding and conduct.

CHRIST IN CONTRAST. NO. IV. The Character of Christ.

W. J. LHAMON.

"Most perfect Hero,
Tried in heaviest plight,
Of labors huge and hard,
Too hard for human weight."

Carlyle considers Napoleon a small soul a sort of "gunpowder force," and estimates that such a soul may "explode his whole virtue suddenly, and thunder himself out and silent in the space of five-and twenty years. While again," he continues, "for a man of true greatness, working with spiritual implements, two centuries is no uncommon period; nay, on this earth of ours, there have been men whose impulse had not completed its development till after fifteen hundred years, and might perhaps be seen individually subsistent after two thousand."

To-day the influence of Jesus is not merely "perhaps to be seen individually subsistent;" it is plainly and avowedly the controlling influence in our modern world's best thought and action. And moreover, in contrast with the waning influence of the world's greatest men Christ's influence is an increasing one. John the Baptist may stand as sponsor for all the prophets, and through the centuries his voice may be heard still as the forerunner of the glory of our Lord, saying, "He must increase but I must decrease." Strangely enough Jesus is not left behind by the centuries; he keeps pace with them; rather, he has long since passed far in advance of them, and we see him quite as much in the light of the future, and At no of the present, as of the past. time can it be said that history fully explains Jesus. Forever and forever prophecy will be required in making up our estimate of him, for after we have heard all that history can say we still feel that he belongs to the future, and that the half has not been told. Intuitively we feel this. Jesus has so impressed himself upon us that it would be unnatural not to have some such feeling mingled consciously or unconsciously with our thought about him. To the reflecting mind this in itself is a proof of the greatness and uniqueness of the man. It is no ordinary being that can sit upon such a throne among the centuries and wield such a scepter over the history and prophecy of succeeding generations.

It is not easy to describe the character of The greatest artists have been Jesus. baffled in their attempts to produce on canvass a truly ideal and cosmopolitan Christ. It is so difficult to bring strength and tenderness into the same face; to make loftiest thought comport with fathomless love; to show the forgiver of sins as also the judge of sinners; to transform the brother into a Lord, and the Lord into a brother, to depict the sufferer as a conquerer, and the crucified One as the risen and reigning One. We have many pictures of the Christ, but is there anywhere in the world on canvass the face of a Jew that can seem to all beholders "the chiefest among the thousands of earth, and the one altogether to be loved?"

A writer in attempting to describe the character of Christ finds himself involved in similar difficulties. The most that one can do is to point out and emphasize a few leading charac eristics and leave the reader to his study of the Gospels, to his own meditations, and his lifelong experiences for the completion of the work.

Greatness of character presupposes intellectual superiority. To-day the loftiest minds are bowing down in readiest, lowliest reverence before the One whose sermon on the mount has furnished a complete code of ethical and social and spiritual living; whose parables are masterpieces in that style of teaching; whose answers to his critics are invariably unanswerable; whose most incidental conversations are replete with fundamental and revolutionary doctrine; whose simplest precepts embrace the profoundest revelations; whose distinctions are inerrant between the accidental and the essential in worship; and whose kingdom rests so completely on things that are fundamental as to warrant him in an outlook for it that is universal. The intellectual supremacy of Jesus is most readily conceded by minds that are most superior. And among the superior minds that look at the world from exceedingly different angles there is unanimity in ascribing the very foremost place to Jesus the Nazarene. Paul and Chrysostom and Luther are among the lights that shine afar from the pulpit, and they themselves are sure that their radiance is reflected wholly from Jesus. Statesmen and poets unite with preachers in their reverence for the mind that was in Christ. Cromwell and Gladstone and Washington among the former; Dante and Browning and Tennyson among the latter may be named, not to crowd many a page with the names of intellectually great ones who bow down very reverently in the presence of their Master.

Again: Greatness of character presupposes a soul full of pure and mighty motives, in other words, love. But the love of Jesus is a fact so patent upon the face of the Gospel, and a theme so worn (though never out-worn) in every pulpit and in a multitude of writings, that we pass it by very briefly here, simply contenting ourselves with Whittier's fine apostrophe to the Christ:

"Through all depths of sin and loss
Drops the plummat of Thy Cross;
Never yet abyes was found
Deeper than that cross could sound."

But the courage of Jesus! That is a characteristic not yet sufficiently emphasized. We have been too much dazzled by the bravery of the battlefield and too little appreciative of moral heroism. Under the excitement of martial music and the clash of arms, and urged on by a thousand or ten times a thousand of his fellows, one may indeed fight bravely and die manfully. But there is a higher courage than that, and one that must command an increasing measure of admiration in proportion as men become increasingly able to admire it. When a man must stand alone in the world, and feel that he is living centuries in advance of his times; when he bears not alone the opposition of foes, but of friends also, which is more crushing by far; when out of sheer moral and spiritual conviction he calmly sets himself against all the social and political and religious tendencies and customs of his people; when with like calmness he puts aside every allurement of the world's thrones and kingdoms and crowns, and deliberately sets out upon a pathway of poverty toward a crown of thorns; when he goes with utmost calmness and sweetness to his martyrdom and his grave; when he does all this knowing precisely what he is doing, and foreknowing it, and foretelling it; and when in doing it he seems all the while to be seeking the greatest good of the greatest number even of those who are arrayed against him, and of all men of all times; when one lives and dies thus he gives us an exhibition of courage other in kind and higher in quality than the battlefield can boast. Mr. Hughes in his "Manliness of Christ" insists upon a just and needful distinction between the courage of self-assertion and the courage of self-sacrifice, and he tells us that the worth of Christ's: courage lies mainly in the sublimity of the latter. Jesus was a hero-every inch of him, but he was a hero on a moral and spiritual plane high above that of our groveling Cæsars and Napoleons. Anybody with good nerves and a provoking occasion, sword or blunderbuss in hand, can shed the blood of another, but who is it that can spurn the sword and shed his own blood in the interests of a movement that is new and untried, and of a cause which he alone of all men sees to be divine and imperative?

The temptation of Jesus is an exhibition of courage. The sermon on the mount is the grand state paper of his new kingdom, launched bravely in all its proclamation of breadth and love and forgiveness into that age of narrowness and hatred and retaliation. The choice of his fishermen and publican disciples is an exhibition of courage, for in it he dared to affront the foolish "four hundred" of his day. The parable of the Good Samaritan thrills with the moral heroism of its author. Mr. Hughes thinks that "the narrative of the seventh and eighth chapters of John, which records the scenes at the feast of Tabernacles, has done more to make men courageous and truly manly than all the stirring accounts of brave deeds which were ever written else where." His rebukes of the Pharisees and Sadducees and Herodians were courageous. His prediction of his death; of the denial of his disciples, and of his resurrection was courageous, and his commission—what can be said of the faith fundamental to it; of its vast outlook, and of the sublime daring embraced in its very conception! There is nothing like it, surely there is nothing like it, anywhere among the proclamations of men. It stands in contrast, like its author, with everything, even the greatest and the best, in its kind.

Again: Consistency is a mark of greatness in character. That a min should, like Daniel, be one with himself through a long lifetime is an unusual tribute to him. Our greatest characters, whether in fiction or in fact, are marked by degrees of consistency, not by the perfection of it. Moses made at least one mistake. David fell into sin. John the Baptist doubted Jesus at the last. Saul of Tarsus was radically wrong. Peter was caught in dissimulation. Luther and Weslev and Carlyle have had each his conversion, and what is conversion but that point in life where a great new career rises up in contradiction to a feeble or foolish old one? Some "everlasting Yes" asserting itself "with grim-eyed defiance" to some "everlasting No!" Mahommet's life is broken in two by the prophet here and the soldier there, and his fall has made him to myriads of people a misleader and a source of sorrow and destruction. Buddha sought peace by the way of the monk and the ascetic; he reduced his food, we are told, to one grain of rice a day; but to the chagrin of his disciples he gave that way up and went forth to the enjoyment of good things, preaching peace through the extinction of all desire. Where is there a man who is one with himself? Isajah cried: "I am a man of unclean lips," and his cry is the symbol of human life at its highest and best.

Daniel has been named above as an example of consistency, and perhaps Joseph and Jeremiah might be named also in the same category. But we know as compared with Jesus very little of them. To know more might be to admire less, for such is the case with many a great man. Besides, the claims of these men are not comparable to those of Christ. In the presence of such claims their lives would seem poor indeed. Christ alone, as has been shown, aspires to the highest claims, and he alone brings his life up to the level of them. He gave the golden rule and he lived it. He inculcated love in an age of hatred, and he practiced it. He taught his disciples to bless those who cursed them, and he showed them how to do it. In the midst of a people where retaliation was the rule he taught forgiveness, and he forgave even to his expiring prayers on the cross. If he taught a length of love that reaches even to enemies he practiced a love that is limitless, reaching beyond the cross even to his eternal regnancy. If the sermon on the mount stands highest among moral codes the cross on Golgotha stands just as high, and the latter is the best comment on the former. All that Jesus condemned he refrained from, and all that he commended he did. If we marvel at his miracles we turn to him, and lo, a greater miracle is there, for he is himself a miracle, "the moral miracle of history." There is no break in his life such as we see in the case of Mohammed, or Buddha, or Moses or David; there is no conversion, but there is continuity. "He is the same yesterday, to-day, and firever." He made no mistake; he retraced not a single step, he recalled not one word, his yea is yea and his nay is nay. Upon his untried pathway he marched inerrantly and with the tread of a hero.

This leads to the last characteristic to be named here. The point excludes comparison, and allows only contrast. Of no other one than Jesus can it be said that "he was made perfect." His enemies never met the challenge—"Which of you convinces me of sin?" They never answered that rebuke of his—"Many good works have I shown you from my Father; for which of these do you stone me?" Pilate said: "I find no fault in him," and the world agrees with this decision.

"He was made perfect through suffering." The perfection of love is wrought out in loving through all trials even "to the end." Had Jesus turned there upon the cross to the hatred of his mockers and murderers we never could have seen in him the perfection of love. The perfection of forgiveness comes in forgiving even "to the end" Had Jesus retaliated and cursed those who were cursing him we never should have had the perfection of forgiveness that rises out of that sweet prayer, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." Had Jesus trembled, and had he failed and denied himself in the presence of the Sanhedrin or of Pontius Pilate as Peter denied him in the presence of the maiden, we never should have had the perfection of courage and candor and truthfulness. Had Jesus not died as he did we should not have had the perfect triumph of a great soul over sin and sinners and sorrow and suffering and death. And had he not risen from the dead we never could have known what it is that constitutes perfect victory over death and that brings perfect life to light, and our poets would not now be singing of that

"Life which is ever Lord of Death," and of that

"Love which can never lose its own."

For such perfection as Jesus has revealed there is no other way than that of suffering, and in the fact of his "endurance to the end" there lies the secret of his many completions. There, on the cross, and there in his resurrection, he gathers up the strands of his life and weaves them into a seamless robe of glory around himself forever. We behold him there, and we exclaim, "He is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens."

CONSTANTINOPLE TO BEIRUT.

CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE.

We left Constantinople Wednesday, Oct. 3rd, at 5:30 P. M., on a French steamer bound for Beirot. The passengers were a mixed multitude of Turks, Jews, Italians, Negroes, Greeks, English, French, Germans and 21 Americans, consisting of four young college graduates en route to Beirut, where they will teach in the American school; a party of ten ideal American girls from the southern states with their chaperone, and our party of seven.

The front of the ship's deck is literally crowded with taird class passengers who have their own bedding and provisions. They are a motley crowd of miserable, filthy, ragged, sickly-looking people, the appearance of whose baggage is indescribable. Darkness came on as we were passing the Seven Towers of the Ancient City, within whose walls we had spent eleven days, and we now enjoyed a good night's rest as we steamed across the Sea of Marmora. We passed Abydos about four o'clock the next morning. From the Acropolis here Xerxes "reviewed" his army and fleet and here Leander swam the Hellespont to gaze upon the beauty of his lovely Hera. Lord Byron, who was skeptical concerning the possibility of this, performed the same feat with even a maimed foot, became a believer in and immortalized the event in verse. Our first stop was at the Dardanelles about five o'clock. Here on either side are strong earthworks mounting enormous cannon, which with the other forts at the entrance below seem to challenge the navies of the earth. The Dardanelles (ancient Hellespont) is 33 miles long and from 1,400 yards to four miles wide, averaging about two miles. Its depth is from 25 to 55 fathoms. We were now crossing the course taken by Jason and his Argonauts in search of the Golden Fleece and although we had no Orpheus nor stopped our ears as Odysseus, yet we heard not the sweet, melodious voices of the sirens. As we left the Hellespont, to our left was a good view of the Plain of Troy and of the site of the ancient city around whose walls Achilles chased Hector; and also of the spot where Agamemnon, Achilles, Menelaus, Nestor and Paris-the heroes of the Iliad-wrought out their glory. On the east was snow-crested Mt. Ida, the place from which the poet represents Jove as viewing the immortal battle field. Far off to our right was "the low ledge of Imbras, over which Neptune looked down upon old Troy from the peaks of 'far-off' Samathrace."

A little later we saw off to our left the site of Alexandria Troas, where Paul saw in a vision "a man of Macedonia," and where he tarried seven days and where "upon the first day of the ueek the disciples came together to break bread" (Acts 20:7-12). We passed near Lesmos, which island is only 7½ miles from the mainland and on whose eastern coast is Mitylene, the intermediate place between Assos and Chios, where Paul's ship cast anchor for a night (20:13-15).

As we entered the harbor of Smyrna about 3 P. M., a most beautiful sight spread out before us. In the distance, crowding the water's edge, lay the quiet city with its white, glittering houses, back of which arose the mountains, crowned with the ruins of an ancient fort. In the harbor, immediately in front of the city, were more than 100 small boats, and just out from these the British fleet of 35 boats-8 battleships, 9 schooners and 18 torpedo boats, with colors proudly flying. It was a most inspiring sight. Smyrna, the principal seaport town of Asia Minor, with 200,000 inhabitants, was founded by Alexander the Great, 22 miles from the site of the ancient city founded 1500 years before Christ. Here was located one of the seven churches of Asia (Rev. 2:8-11). Polycarp, disciple of John and bishop of this church, suffered martyrdom, saying at the last, "Eighty and six years have I served Him and He has never forsaken me and I will rot deny Him in my last hour." His tomb is just outside the city. Here also is one of the seven birth places of Homer. Smyrna has a greater proportion of foreigners than any other town in Turkey. It has many fine European stores and consequently the old bazaars are forsaken and are much inferior to those of Constantinople. Its land-locked harbor is one of the best in the East, and as we steamed out through the British fleet about 8 P. M., we Americans sang our patriotic songs most enthusiastically and a vessel saluted by dipping its flag. We have a mission station located here, but as we only had a few hours to do the city, we were on the go continuously in our cabs and were unable to meet our brethren. We were now within 40 miles of Ephesus-one of the most interesting places connected with Bible history, but as our ship was already four days late because of quarantine, we were compelled to mias the site of one of the seven churches of Asia and of the temple of Diocia, the home of Aquila and Priscilla and Trophimus, the burial place of Luke, the spot where Paul labored two years, the place visited by Timothy and the home of the elders called to Miletus, of Alexander the coppersmith and the sons of Sceva. We greatly lamented the fact that we were compelled to pass by the city of the Ephesians. Twelve miles out from Smyrna we passed the Island of Chios, now called Scio. It is 32 miles long and from 8 to 18 broad. Here Paul's ship cast anchor one night (Acts 20:15), and here is another one of the seven birth-places of Homer. On this island in 1822 the Turks massacred 30,000 people and led as many more into captivity after burning their cities. The next terrible calamity for these unfortunate islanders was the earthquake of April 3, 1881, when fully 6,000 people perished and scores and hundreds of buildings were wrecked, the very earth opening like massive jaws to swallow its victims whole. Our ship cast anchor at Samos about 8 o'clock Friday morning and lifted it at 2 P. M. Pythagoras was born here and Paul's ship touched at this island when he was returning from his third missionary journey.

Just as the sun was setting we came in sight of the Isle of Patmos, and as I thought of the ble sed old man whom Jesus lovednow past four score and ten years and alone on that rocky isle, "for the word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ"-my eyes filled with tears and I blessed the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works unto the children of men. He who did not leave John alone has promised to be with us unto the ends of the earth. The sea separated the apostle from his friends and brethren and where there is "co more sea" there will be no more separation forever. The island is 24 miles west of Asia Minor, and is divided into two nearly equal portions by a very narrow isthmus, on the east side of which is the harbor and a town. On the summit of the hill to the south is the monastery bearing the name of "John the Divine." There is a grotto or cave half way up the hill, where tradition says John received the Revelation.

About 8 o'clock the next night we came in sight of the lighthouse on the Island of Cyprus. This island occupies a distinguished place in both sacred and profane history, is 140 miles long and about 50 miles broad at the widest point. Here was the home of Barnabas and this island was visited by Paul on his first missionary journey. At 8 o'clock Sunday morning we came in sight of Beirut, and about 14 of us gathered in a small room and had Scripture reading and several prayers and sang many dear old songs. We were soon to place our feet on the "land of promise," and never was I in a more spiritual meeting than our little praise and thanksgiving service for the safe voyage just back of us and the Holy Land just before us. When we anchored in the harbor a great throng of little boats came rushing about the boat, and such a babel of loud voices we had never heard, and more, before the door was opened for us to pass out, the boatmen, all dressed like Turks and Arabs, came climbing right up the side of the boat and climbed over the rail and vied with each other to get every man's baggage. Such confusion, disorder, hubbub and jamming-it was enough to strain every nerve and it took an effort to stay on your own feet and keep other people off. But soon we were safely lodged in a little boat and were rowing for the shore and the custom house.

Education should teach not how to make money, save incidentally, but how to spend it. It is not necessary to go to school to learn how to make money. That can be learned elsewhere even more readily. All that is needed is a book of interest tables and a hard heart. But real school training should teach how to spend money wisely, for what purposes to employ time and wealth, how to get the most out of life. The commercial spirit ought to be kept out of the schools. Let humanity be taught there first. Man does not live by bread alone. Do not let our children be indoctrinated with the belief that books are only written to teach plowing and buying and selling.—Columbia

THE ELIJAHS AND THE ELI-SHAS OF THE RESTORA-

TION.* (Concluded.)

BY J. S. LAMAR. Thus in one day, almost in one hour, Elijah had been the means and instrument of God's righteous judgment and of his abundant mercy. Surely now, he must think as he nears the close of his sixteen miles' exultant run before Ahab's chariot. the good news has gone before him; surely brave hearts and strong arms will be gathered at the gates of Jezreel prepared to surround and protect him. But he feels no brother's gra-p; he hears no exulting shout. It is ominous. He turns aside from the gate and stands in the darkness and the rain to wait. Presently Ahab, the king, drives madly through the gates bearing the news of the shameful defeat and bloody death of the queen's favorites and prophets. In wild fury she proclaims her murderous vengeance, and by some means conveys the determined purpose of her soul to the friendless prophet. He must flee for his life-out in the dreary darkness-on along the lonesome road -on, on, till he comes to Beersheba, which belongeth to Judah, where he left his servant, but he himself went a day's journey into the wilderness, and came and sat down under a juniper tree. There, worn and weery from his long journey, hungry and faint and lonely, and in sore mental depression and discouragement he prays for death -the only prayer of his, so far as we know, that was not answered, and that never through the rolling ages will be answered, but we may learn from the state of heart out of which it arose that where God would write his deepest truth in the soul, he must prepare the tablet for its inscription - there must be a more perfect effacement of self, a quickened sense of unworthiness-of failure-of disappointment, and the softening effect of pain and sorrow. Thus Elijah was cast down but not forsaken. Supplied with bread and water by an angel, he went in the strength of that food forty days and forty nights to Horeb, the Mount of God. We may infer the subject of his meditations during the long journey by noting how its:ill lingers with him at its close. It was the old, old problem of the wonders of divine providence-a problem whose solemn interest presses forever upon the soul, while its infinite complexity and mystery baffled and confounded the intellect -What means h this? I have been faithful and true. I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts. I have been aroused by the insults cast upon him; for the children of Israel have forsaken his covenant, thrown down his altars and slain his prophets with the sword. There is nobody left but me, and me a fugitive from the wrath of an infamous woman. And yet God, if he would, might crush them like a worm -God, who is able to arrest the rain from heaven and send down his fire in consuming wrath upon their guilty heads. What can it mean! With such perplexing soul-questions he comes to Horeb. Far up in its lonely heights he enters at nightfall a gloomy cave and lies down to sleepperchance to dream. Early in the morning the word of the Lord comes to him, What doest thou here, Elijah? Thus is he searched. He must understand himself before he can know God. He answers in the set phrases which he has doubtless been repeating to himself, but no explanation is returned to him; he is simply called to stand upon the mount before the Lord. The scene now is most impressive and solemn. The helpless man, bewildered, agitated and wondering, steps forth from the cave into the dismal fogs that still wrap in gloom the mountain heights-a mountain where of old, amid awful thunderings and lightnings, had been heard the voice of the great and terrible God. There, remote from human habitation and human sympathy, he stands with trembling knees and quaking heart alone-alone before the Lord. Not a bird sings afar. Not a butterfly sports in the air. And around, far as the eye can reach, is naught but bleak desolation and ruin. Presently, as he feels the premonitions of the coming terrors, or soon after they begin, he steps back into the cave. "And, behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord, but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire," No, the Lord was in none of these-it was Elijah that was in them. They were sent before to herald the coming Lord, and were but representations of the storms that raged in his soul, of the destructive power that he longed to invoke, of the consuming fire which he was ready to kindle. The prophet reads the deep meanings of the wonderful lesson, and is subdued and penitent. Called once more to stand in the door of the cave, he looks abroad upon a scene of perfect peace. The mighty roar of the dreadful hurricane is lulled to rest; the shudder of the quaking earth is no longer felt; the flames as of a world on fire are gone. And there is a great calm. The sky, serene and peaceful, spans the heavens with its lovely arch. The sunbeams, so noiseless and gentle, kiss the rugged rocks into quiet beauty. As he stands and gazes and ponders, the spirit of that gracious and benign power, gentle as the touch of a mother's hand, soothing as the lullaby of a mother's cradle-song; and yet mightier than wind or earthquake or fire-subduing and mastering these abnormal and destructive forces-this spirit of eternal peace sinks into his heart. And now, with face mantled, he hears deep down in his soul "a still small voice"still as the infinite depths-mighty as God-What dost thou here, Elijah? He returns in words the old answer, but now with what new meanings, and in what a spirit of humble submission and trustful resignation. The great prophet has become the great man-great according to the standard of divine measurement-by becoming little, and exalted by becoming meek and lowly in heart. But we should not expect the current of so deep and strong a life to be turned back upon itself in a monent. He must be trained and disciplined. He is, however, assured of great changes impending which will powerfully help and strengthen him. The fearful judgments and scourgings of heaven are not henceforth to be sent through him, but through worldly agencies. He is told to anoint Hazael to be king over Syria, and Jehu, the son of Nimshi, to be king over Israel. They shall be the divine nstruments of judgment and scourging; and further, 'Elisha, the son of Shaphat of Abelmeholah, shalt thou anoint to be prophet in thy room; him that escapeth the sword of Hazael shall Jehu slay, and him that escapeth the sword of Jehu shall Elisha slay"-wielding as he will the sword of the Spirit. He was to call Elisha to be with him for companionship and fellowship and help, to be trained for his high office, while Elisha breathes around him continually his own gentle and patient and loving spirit.

For many years Elijah lingered, accompanied by Elisha as junior and servant; he looked up the 7,000 faithful ones left in Israel; selected out from them pious young men to be trained in schools of the prophets; he spent his days confirming the faith and directing the walk of the people; listening reverently to the spirit of the still small voice within and growing more and more into the divine likeness, till the time came for him to be taken away. This being prophetically indicated, he started for the designated place. His tender love and faithful kindness had so endeared him to the younger prophet that Elisha, though repeatedly asked, refused to leave him. Together, therefore, they went from Gilgal to Bethel, to Jericho, to the Jordan, close to the spot where in later ages another great Elijah was to proclaim the coming of a Divine Elisha. Using for the last time his wonderful mantle, he divided the stream and the two men crossed over; and as they climbed the opposite slope, the elder man's heart thought tenderly of the approaching separation, and he sald unto Elisha, "Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken away from thee." And Elisha, who thought not at all of the old Elijahspirit of vindictive judgment, but felt that he would be undone without the sweet, tender spirit which he had known and loved so well, and which had brought his master so near to God, said, "I pray thee, let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." It may be that Elijab, like our departing Lord, felt a longing for human companionship and sympathy as he approached the deep mystery of the supreme moment-or it may be that he wished to test whether the younger man, who had been true and faithful thus far, would hold out to the very end; at any rate he said, "Thou hast asked a hard thing, nevertheless if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be so." Going on a little further he could, perhaps, point out the very mountain top from which Moses, the man of God, ascended to heaven-Moses whose law he had restored and whose authority he had vindicated. Presently the mountains of Gilead are approached, and as he looks upon them he thinks perhaps-for he is a man of like passions with us-of his boyhood's happy home, nestling over there. In fancy he sees the humble house in which he was born; in which as an infant he received a mother's loving kies, as a youth his father's faithful instruction in the law; beyond the house he may see the copious mountain spring from which, when a boy, he had taken many a draft of cool refreshment; lower down in the valley is the garden with its melons and vines; up yonder the cattle lazily browse on the hillside; while his gray-haired father sits calmly in the door, and the sweet-faced old mother stands by his side-oh, it is so peaceful and sweet! After all these years of labor and sorrow and strife there is blessed rest-there is tender love-it is home-it is home! No, not there, not there, O greatest of prophets and of men, thy home is not there in the mountains of Gilead-it is up yonder in the mountain of God.

"And it came to pass, as they still went on and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder; and Elisha saw it, and he cried, My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof; and he saw him no more; and he took hold of his own clothes and rent them in two pieces. He took up also the ma tle of Elijah that fell from him, and went back and stood by the bank of Jordan."

Elisha was himself a prophet mighty in words and deeds, but I shall not trace his career. It is familiar to you. As you are well aware, the predominant spirit of his life and work is seen in that of the later years of Elijah, while in the number and variety of his miracles, as in the gracious goodness and tenderness of his heart, he, more fully and distinctly than any other Old Testament worthy, foreshadowed the coming Messiah. He lived, after Elijah's translation, more than fifty years, the guide and counselor of kings and captains, the friend of the poor, the instructor of all, and at last, howeved of God and venerated and loved by the people, he left behind an immortal name and entered into the bliss of an immortal life.

It now only remains to take a brief survey of the period covered by the Elijahs and Elishas of our own restoration movement. And here, though I have already detained you long, I must invoke your kindest at ention and indulgence. While I shall speak both of my own brethren and of others with perfect candor and frankness, honestly praising where I can, faithfully plaming where I must, I shall trust to be influenced throughout by the love of the gracious Spirit in whose fellowship I seek to live and upon whose help I depend.

The very primum mobile of our movement-its first sacred inspiration and impulse -was an earnest longing to restore the unity of divided Christendom and bring all the people of God into fraternal relations and hearty fellowship. The basis pr posed was the living Christ, accepted and obeyed according to his word. They submitted no creed made by themselves, they would accept none made by others. With earnest and tender pleadings they insisted upon the sufficiency of his divine foundation, and the solemn duty of Christians to give up every human substitute and unite upon it. A few of their brother Christians listened with favor and came to their help, but by most their plea was regarded as chimerical, their foundation insufficient, and their object undesirable. The opposition was so inveterate and widespread that it amounted to a union of all the sects to oppose union After a while our fathers discovered that their labors for union were being hindered and obstructed by another cause, namely, the character of the evangelizing and revival work of the times. On the one hand men were preaching the cheerless philosophy of human nature, along with the postulate of divine decrees; and on the other they were working up wildest excitements of superheated possions accompania by unrestrained outcries of fervid and unreason ing emotion; and all this attributed without doubt or question to the direct influence of the Holy Ghost Now, it was in view of a state of things so distracting to the public mind and so obstructive of any proper interest in their sacred plea. that our fathers were led to see and to restore to practical use the primitive plan of salvation, i. e., the great commission as expounded and illustrated in the Book of Acts. I beg you to observe that this was not in their original con templation, nor thought of in their over ure for union. They believed that union, as it became gradually accomplished, would result more and more in the conversion of the world, and they gave very little independent consideration to the mode of conversion. Now at length, in view of the unexpected obstructions retarding their great movement, they recognized the discovery of this revealed plan of salvation as an open door through which they should enter directly upon the conversion of the world. It was an intimation from God. They studied it carefully. They saw its wonderful adaptation to the work before them; saw its divinity, its completeness, and its biblical harmonies, and so, after much deliberation and some hesitancy, they submitted it to the world by a practical resort to it in preaching Instantly and almost universally it was condemned by the churches. It was heterodox; it was heretical; it was unsound; it was ruinous and deadly. Pulpits thundered and anath-matized; the press fired its broadeides; the people were solemnly warned; church doors were locked; Christian hearts were closed, and still the combat deepened. It was earnest conviction on one side, it was earnest disbelief and distrust on the other. In any case one result that followed was a wonderfu awakening of intelligent interest on the subject; and another was the discovery, surprising alike to its friends and its foes, that this simple commission was, in competent hands, the most potent instrument of conversion that had ever been known. Wielded by those grand old pioneers, who poured into it the tender love of Christ, who supported it with matchless argumentative power, and urged it home with a pathos of tearful earnestness that melted all hearts and subdued every will, few could wholly reject it. Its simplicity was its power. A man could understand it. He knew what he had to do. He could read it for himself. It accorded with the Bible, it satisfied his common sense. It was visible. It was tangible. It was divine. It was the truth. Its victories multiplied. Its adherents increased beyond all precedent. They reminded one of the numeration table, going from units to tens, to hundreds, to thousands, to tens of thousands, to hundreds of thousands, to millions. The blessed little evangel sounded through all the land; it spread to foreign lands, to every continent, to the isles of every sea, across the roar of every ocean. Opposition only strengthened it, misrepresentation aroused its advocates to higher endeavors, obstructions and hindrances speeded its course. Its triumph was complete.

We shall do well to recall here that if the amazing victory was gained by means of a mighty instrument, that instrument was wielded by mighty men-by the Campbells, the Scotts, the John Smiths, the Haydens, the John T. Johnsons, and a host besides, including our own humbler pioneers and fathers whose lips had been touched by the same coal, and whose arms were nerved by the same strength. They preached first principles, but in their case it was preaching-it was the heralding of the soul's King and Saviour. They found men confused by the jangle of sectarian strife, and wandering bewildered in the mazes of conflicting doctrines, and groping in the night of deep and incomprehensible mysteries; and their gospel conveyed to them light and peace and joy. To the sick it was a healing medicine, to the guilty it was pardon, to the weak and faint, it was a divine power. They started with faith as the first and all-inclusive principle. Wherever it was necessary they would establish this truth by argument, but this was only a preliminary, and in itself but an impotent doctrine. The main purpose was to generate and confirm this faith right then, and right there, in the hearts of all present. Prophets, apostles, all divine tongues and divine works were brought forward to testify. Christ himself was set forth, the loving, the gracious, the wonderful, counselor, the tender shepherd-the crucified, the exalted, the glorified, bending his ear in infinite love, willing to save, and able to save. Repentance, too, was preached. It was not set forth as a mere term in a theological system, occupying this or that place, before faith or after faith or along with faith, it was an urgent, pressing duty-the moving of heart and will away from self and sin towards the Christ in whom now the soul trusted. Nor was this enough. The Lord so loved the believing penitent that he desired to come nearer to him still. He had appointed a meeting place. He has gone there before you, they said; he is waiting there to receive you; look; his own voice proclaims him; see him down there in the consecrated waters of holy baptism, using them as his outstretched hand to embrace and bless you,-nearer, oh, weeping sinner-closer, oh trembling soul, come closer, closer, yield to his tender pleading, clasp the same outstretched hand with undoubting faith, and be drawn to his heart in glad welcome and free for-

If I have enabled you to hear even a faint echo of those powerful voices of the past—voices full of tearful pleading and divine love—you will not be surprised at their wonderful effect. The churches drank in the divine spirit and were filled with joy. Men of the world were awakened to a lively and serious interest. Hard hearts were broken down; the skeptical and careless were aroused to sober reflection, and brought in large numbers to the obedience of faith. Often the very devotees of fashion and pleasure, of worldliness and vanity, who came to scoff remained to pray; were led to realize the emptiness and ruin of their prodigal life, and came back to a loving Father's heart and home, partaking of the festal feast of a heavenly gladness.

I must now speak for a moment, ungracious as it may seem, of an abuse of these elementary principles that gradually grew up among usspreading I know not how widely, but greatly retarding our progress. When the fathers had passed away, men rose up-most of them earnest and well-meaning-who tried to fill their places. But no little David could wear the armor of Saul. They essayed to preach the same gospel, but it was only a feeble copy of the old masters. Very often, indeed, it was so changed as hardly to be recognized. The very terms which had come to us filled with the love and life of Christ, seemed emptied of these saving virtues, and sounded as a cold philosophy, an unmoving argument, a flawless but impotent logic. These well-meaning but mistaken brethren fancied that to discuss the plan of salvation was to preach the gospel. With endless iteration and wearisome sameness they proved the doctrine of faith, repentance and baptism, day in and day out, in place and out of place to the saints who already believed it, and to sinners who felt no need of it-never learning nor thinking that a treatise on first principles, though delivered from the pulpit and supported by consummate ability, was not the preaching of the gospel of salvation. The churches began to see this and became dissatisfied. The preachers, in many cases, realized and deplored it. The situation was peculiar, and while the preachers might not have handled it most wisely, they were not wholly to blame. Many of them labored in places remote from the centres of high intelligence, where they were met by the old traditional antagon'sms and by the misrepresentations transmitted from a bigoted past. They were assailed by ministers on whose minds the sun of this new age had not risen-cold, narrow, unsympathetic and intensely partisan. These also circulated far and near numberless tracts and pamphlets and leaflets, which, however feeble in argument, were powerful in epithet, offensive in tone and most unchristian in spirit -- and which, though aimed dir ctly at us, were even more hurtful to the interests of religion in general. In such places, therefore, and under such circumstances, it was of course necessary and proper for our preachers to renew the old fight, and to bring out the old argumentative weapons whose effective power was so well understood. If they failed, as sometimes they might, to supplement the argument by the preaching, the genuine preaching of first principles, the resulting effect was not good. It was like so much of the work of the Christian world which it was our mission to correct, it converted men to doctrines rather than to Christ, it made them content to be sectarians rather than Christians. Many of the truly pious of other churches, lovers of God and of Christ, finding no comfort in the perpetual repetition of a mere logic that was crushing, freezing and lifeless, gradually drew away from us; but the citef evil result was the false impression produced, as will upon our own people as upon others, that this mere doctrine, these abstract and lifeless terms of salvation, were our true and fundamental position-these rather than unity in Christ, which had led to these as its necessary supplement, but to these as preached by the fathers and the apostles, filled with the warmth and power of an infinite love and a gracious salva-I rejoice to know that in the deepening tion. spiritual life of this happy Elisha age, mest of us have gotten back to the original heights from which some of us had declined. As a consequence the world is again ringing with our unexampled triumphs for Christ; the holy men and women of other churches have come back to us in the sweet fellowship of fraterial love, while the glorious future shines brightly for us all in the face of The leftler spirits among all Jesus Chris; Christian people are moving on converging lines. They have not yet come together but they moving towards the one common center of attraction, and thus coming closer to each other. For ourselves we have not ceased, we shall not cease, we dare not cease, to preach our sacred First Principles. The Lord's commission has cot been abrogated, nor the record of apostolic conversions lost its authority. We shall continue faithfully to proclaim these holy truths to the bewildered, the perishing and the lost, and we shall hope in the end as in the beginning, to fill them more and more with the love and saving power of Christ And while we shall not offensively press their adoption upon other Christians, we do expect that And while we shall as these get nearer to the divine fountain they will see that its life giving waters can best flow through its own appropriate and prescribed channels.

And now, beloved, your close attention and unwearied patience command my appreciation and my thanks I should be unkind to you if I ven tured to tax you longer, but I should be untrue to myself if I failed, in a few closing words, to emphasize a matter that lies nearest to my heart. By very many the great subject of Christian union is not properly understood nor wisely advocated. is in the air; it o cupies every heart; it is the burden of serious thought and many prayers, but it is not the outward thing that most Christian people suppose. Thus supposing, they are thinking of platforms and compromises; they are devising plans of confederation and co-operation; smaller sects are coming together here and there into greater sec's; and the ultimate aim and hope bring all sects together in one all-embracing body, but still as the device of human wisdom and the work of men's hands, still essentially a sect and a sin, and no less a sin because a great sect. Has it occurred to you to observe that the Savior's prayer was not primarily for union but for unity, not for the outward semblance but for the inner reality, not for the form but the life —"that they all may be one?" When the true Christian union comes, it will not be a conglomerate of heterogene ous elements driven together by dynamic force, and glued together, however compactly, by some external influence; it will not be a mere truce of warring sectaries, nor yet the hiding and hushing up of honest differences and matured convictions; the components of the union will really and truly be one, as the Father and the Son are one. divine ideal corresponds to its shadowed image as it is witnessed in the biogenesis of science, where as we see it the body of the coming animal is not an outward project made and fashioned off yonder by even the creative hand, it comes by a vital process. The numerous elements are attracted and molded by accretion and growth upon a preexisting and living germ-upon it and by it; re-ceiving its form and its life not by plastic molding but by the infusion of the hidden life of the germinal cell. And so the union for which we labor and pray will come not as a fabrication but as a living development. Never were our venerable fathers more divinely guided than when they were led to postulate the living Christ as the one true foundation and creed of the one church. day, after all these years, the best thought of the age is beginning to see this to see through all the mists of tradition and human speculation, and better still the best hearts are beginning to feel that nowhere in all the wide world can Christians truly unite save in Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God And not the narrow and sectarian in spirit but the good and the true and the sanctified will come together there. The spirit of the Lord is moving them, the prayer of the Savior is vrging them, the cry of the perishing world is arous-ing them. And they will come. I know not when For myself I care not when nor nor how. how. Let it be as God wills—in his own time, in his own way, for the work is his, and his the means and instruments. It is ours only to labor, to wait and to pray, for not ours but thine, oh, Father in heaven, thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever and ever. Amen.

Our Budget.

-Remember the aged and dependent preachers next Lord's day. Read the literature we print on the subject this week.

-The growth of good feeling among the different churches in the smaller towns throughout the country is one of the signs of the times-a sign of the triumph of Christianity over party spirit.

-It is a great loss our missionary work has sustained in the death of Dr. Gerould, of Cleveland, O. His heart was fully enlisted in the cause of Foreign Missions, and his zeal and liberality in that direction have written his name on the hearts of our missionaries and in the history of our Foreign Mission work. We have asked one who knew him well to write a sketch of his life for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. To his bereaved wife our sincere sympathy is extended.

-We invite attention to our partial prospectus this week for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1901. Our readers may as well know that we have never planned so generously to provide the best mental and spiritual food for their use and benefit as we have for the coming year. We have made no advance in price, however, but, on the contrary, we continue our club rates, modified so as to make them available to a large part of -The Chinese minister, Wu, has been compar ing Confucianism and Christianity, and thinks the former is superior to the latter. He acknowledges that Confucianism is not a religion at all But Wu does not know what Christianity is. His speech makes this very plain. He is a very intelligent pagan, but he is a pagan nevertheless. Can not Bishop Power, or some of the other Washington bishops, get Wu into a good Sundayschool class where he can learn what be the first principles of the Gospel of Christ? Truly we have "the heathen at our door."

-W. K. Homan, late editor Christian Courier, Dallas, Texas, has resumed the practice of law at Colorado, Texas, with his son Patrick, under the firm name of Homan & Homan. By the way, the speech of W. K. Homan, printed in the booklet entitled "The Church on Trial, or The Old Faith Vindicated," which we have recently re-read, is a masterly defense and statement of our position as against such factions as the "Firm Foundation" element in Texas. That pamphlet ought to be sown all over Texas, and would prove interesting to any one who would like to understand that remarkable lawsuit and its triumph for truth and unity.

- A Christian Science magazine, in giving directions to those who desire "absent treatment." in emergency cases, says: "Persons ought not to wait until death has set in before telegraphing us for treatment. It seems to be much easier to destroy error when sickness is in its incipient stages than it is after death has commenced. Why this is true we do not know, but it is true." So 'tis, so 'tis! It is quite a concession though for them to admit it. That piece of advice to do something while sickness is yet in its incipient stages and not to wait until death has begun, is one of the few sane utterances which have escaped the censorship which guards Christian Science writers against the dissemination of anything but nonsense. We are inclined to believe, however, that the writer overestimates the difficulty of determining why this should be done. That's easy. If you take the patient in the early stages he may get well of his own accord, or the natural (though little understood) workings of the law of suggestion may help him out even in the absence of a physician, but if you wait until he is nearly dead, then, of course, he dies.

-The Chinese Recorder for October contains an article by C B. Titus, our missionary at Lii Chou Fu. Central China, entitled "Seeking to Save; Have We a Definite Plan?" The writer points out the danger of baptizing converts too soon and sending them out as preachers before they are properly instructed and before it is certain even that they are not "rice Christians."

-Archbishop Ireland recently made a speech in Washington advocating the restoration of temporal sovereignty to the Pope. Archbishop Ireland has recently returned from Rome where he had several interviews with His Holiness. Whether this speech is a case of post hoc merely, or of propter hoc, sequence or consequence, we leave our readers to judge. But the argument of the distinguished prelate, that the Pope must not be the subject of any government, else religion is not free and untrammeled, involves some consequences of a very grave character, which he does not seem to see.

-At the Kansas City Convention it was "Resolved, that we raise not less than $100,000 for Home Missions in 1901." It is quite generally understood that resolving a thing does not accomplish it unless the resolution be put into the form of earnest effort. It is not a moment too early for us to plan to make that resolution a success. The sum mentioned is a very modest one considering the needs of the field and the numerical strength of the brotherhood. Never were the demands greater upon us for aggressive work in America than at present. Let there be a strenuous effort on the part of all ministers and teachers to educate the people on the needs of the field and upon the necessity of evangelizing America, not only for the sake of our own country and its institutions, but for the sake of the world.

—Cardinal Vaughan, in summing up the condition of the world at this turning point of the century, concludes that the times are badly out of joint. "In the present condition of society the temporal sovereignty of the Holy See is absolutely necessary for good government of the Church and men's souls," but there is no chance of restoring it. The fact that the Pope was not called in to participate as a sovereign in the international peace confererce is considered ominous. Compulsory education is a menace. Commerce is mere greed and the presence of foreign troops in China means treachery on the part of the Powers. No wonder one who starts with a postulate that no good thing can come until the Pope is again at the head of the temporal kingdom, finds the outlook very gloomy. The signs all point the other way.

-A writer in a southern paper, giving his reasons for not voting at the recent election, quotes from Daniel to the effect that the most High God rules in the kingdoms of men and gives them to whomsoever he will. He knew the right man would be elected because he knew that God was controlling the election and so it was not worth while to vote. It might have been supposed that by this year of grace and general enlightenment, the belief that God controls elections without the use of voters and rules the ffairs of men without employing human agents, had been superseded by a more intelligent and more religious conception of both God and the world. That conception belongs to the transition from the seventeenth century to the eighteenth rather than to the dawn of the twentieth. The writer of the article evidently feels that the thing needs modification, for he admits that through "human instrumentality" God has placed every President in the chair. If he will abide by that statement, that the voter is God's instrument for the election of a President, then the refusal to cast a ballot means simply a refusal to act as one of God's human agents for doing his work in the world.

-It is but twelve days from the date of this paper to Christmas. It is high time you sent the Christian Publishing Co. your order for Christmas

-You will never be able to purchase a fine Bible so cheaply as now. We are closing out what we have left of certain styles of Bagsters and Oxfords at less than wholesale prices.

-We shall soon have to put our presses to work on the third edition of the Christian Lesson Commentary for 1901. This splendid annual is more popular than ever before.

-Remember that your pastor will probably receive numerous pairs of slippers and several dressing gowns from female admirers, and let your Christmas gift to him be something else-preferably a good book.

-Give your children good books for their Christmas gifts. Let them learn, early in life, the benefits of reading and the pleasure of acquaintanceship with great writers and their works. The Christian Publishing Co. has prepared a fine list of books suitable for children and young people.

-One of the oldest readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST called at our office this week to renew her subscription in person. She is Sister S. T. Halyard, now of our Old Ladies' Home in this city, who is in her 93d year. She walked up three flights of stairs to the editor's office, and did not complain of it as much as younger people have been known to do. Asked as to the secret of her long life, she said it was "the mercy of God." Further investigation revealed the fact that she has led a temperate, active life and is a stranger to tea and coffee. She was born in Spottsylvania County, Va., in 1808, was reared in Kentucky and migrated to Missouri about fif y years ago, and has been a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST from its birth. This last fact we commend to our readers who are interested in the question of longevity.

-The Ministerial Institute of the Springfield, Mo., district in its regular meeting held at Aurora, Mo., Nov. 19, 20, passed resolutions notifying the churches that Isaac W. Bridges, whom they have been unable to bring to repentance for his wrongdoing, is no longer to be considered a minister in the Christian Church, Mr. Bridges himself publishes the following notice in the Boll var Free Press:

BOLIVAR, Mo , Aug. 1, 1900 .- To the churches where I have preached and rom which I have been recomm-nded, let this be a notice that I no longer ask for fellowship nor endorsement, and that the churches are no long-r responsible for my manner of life, having no connection in any way, whatever, until the wolf can be trapped and the head of the serpent bruised. I will do it.
I. W BRIDGES.

It is to be hoped by all good people that "the wolf can be trapped and the head of the serpent bruised;" but we suggest that our brother seek the Lord's help in this undertaking.

Prof. B. A. Hinsdale.

We were surprised and shocked to learn a few days ago of the death of this distinguished brother who for many years has occupied so prominent a place in our literature and in the educational world. We had not even heard of his ill health. We saw him in July last at the Hiram Jubilee and heard him read an historic paper of rare literary beauty and full of tender historic reminiscences. We learn that he died at Atlanta, Ga., the 29th ult., whither he had gone a few we ks before in search of health. He was suffering from nervous prostration. Brother Hinsdale was at the time of his death Professor of Pedagogy in the Michigan University. He was widely known among educators and is the author of several well-known books. among which may be mentioned "The Genuineness and Authenticity of the Go pels," "Ecclesiastical Tradition," "Jesus as a Teacher, and the Making of the New Testament," "The Old Northwest," and other works, more especially on the subject of teaching. He was a frequent contributor to our periodical literature.

For many years he had confined his literary contributions largely to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Perhaps we have had no abler writer in our ranks than Professor Hinsdale. He had rare insight into history and into the forces that make history. His work entitled "The Old Northwest" is the best bird'seye view of American history we ever read. As a religious writer he penetrated to the heart of his subject. He had no taste for, and little pa tience with, the small, petty questions upon which sects divide and quarrel, but he loved to deal with the great fundamentals of Christian faith aid doctrine. He was a liberal mind d man, broad and catholic in his views of religion, yet loyal to Jesus Christ as the revealer of God to man. An intimate friend of Garfield whom he knew at Hiram. and whose close friend he remained until the death of the latter, he shared his confidence and became his literary executor. While he had an outward seeming of coldness, he possessed a heart capable of the warmest friendships and of the most tender empions. We sympathize profoundly with his wife and daughters in their great bereavement, and tend-r our sincerest sympathy. We hope to be able to present later a suitable estimate of his life and labors.

Church Expansion in Kirksville.

The Christian Church at Kirksville, in the northwestern part of Missouri, a little over two hundred miles from St. Louis, has recently undergone an expansion which means much for the cause in that part of the state. The church itself has for some time been expanding in membership, notably under the labors of Simpson Ely, and of the present pastor, H. A. Northcutt, until an expansion of the building became a necessity. Accordingly the old brick house has been revolutionized, modernized, beautified and enlarged into a magnificent autitorium which seated perhaps 1,200 people at two of the meetings on last Lord's day. The work was begun during the past sum mer and has been carried forward with great expedition, the church meanwhile worshiping in the hall connected with the Osteopathic Institute of that city. Last Lord's day was the day set apart for formal re-opening and dedication, and by invitation the editor of this paper had the pleasure of being present with them, and of speaking morning, afternoon and evening to great audiences.

It was a charming winter day and the capacity of the enlarged edifice was taxed to contain the people, especially at the morning and evening services. The entire improvement cost $6,500, including the new carpet and the splendid new seats. The new part of the building is so arranged that it can be cut off from the main auditorium for Sunday-school or prayer-meeting purposes by a sliding partition. There was an indebtedness of $2,200 to be provided for, and the greater part of this was pledged in the forenoon service, and the remaind r in the evening, with a little margin. The church is not wealthy. and the giving was very liberal, very prompt and very general. In the afternoon there was another great meeting, in which the Lord's Supper was observed, and short speeches made by local ministers, of a congratulatory character, closing with a brief address by the writer and the dedication of the building. It was a delightful occasion every way. The music was excellent. There was a large chorus choir, and the congregation joined heartily in the music. We were greatly delighted with the church at Kirasville. We have loved Brother Northcutt for many years and this association with him, and he manifest tokens of his good influence in the church and community, only endeared him to us all the more. He himself set the example in liberality, and by so doing made it possible for us to raise the indebtedness. We were told that the church, even in its enlarged

FREE TO SUFFERERS.

The New Cure for Kidney, Bladder and Uric Acid Troubles.

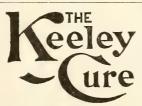

Almost everybody who reads the newspapers is sure to know of the wonderful cures made by Dr. Kilmer's Swamp Root, the great kidney remedy.

It is the great medical triumph of the nineteenth century; discovered after years of scientific research by Dr. Kilmer, the eminent kidney and bladder specialist, and is wonderfully successful in promptly curing kidney, liver, bladder and uric acid troubles.

Swamp-Root has been tested in so many ways, in hospital work, in private practice, among the helpless too poor to purchase relief, and has proved so successful in every case, that a special arrangement has been made by which all readers of the Christian-EvangeList who have not already tried it, may have a sample bottle sent free by mail; also a book telling more about Swamp-Root and how to find out if you have kidney or bladder trouble. When writing mention reading this generous offer in the Christian-EvangeList, and send your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. The regular fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes are sold by all first-class druggists.

form, is hardly capable of seating the people who attend the regular Lord's day services, for it has been in use several weeks since its completion. The State Normal School and the American Institute of Osteopathy, founded by Dr. Still, bring a great many students to the place and make it a great center for religious work. The school of Osteopathy has about six hundred students, although it is a comparatively new institution and the system of treatment it represents is a modern innevation. It exerts a very wide influence, however, throughout that section of the state, and there is no question but that its influence is extending.

The church has now a very promising future before it, and under the leadership of Brother Northcutt, who ought to remain there, we should say for many years yet, it may accomplish a great work for the Master. Its church building now is creditable to the congregation and to the town. It is gratifying to note the steady improvement in church architecture among our Missouri churches. It augurs a richer and more fruitful spiritual life.

W. W. Burks, having removed from Parsons, Kansas, to Creston, Ia., reports that the work at the latter place is opening up encouragingly and that he will hold a meeting in January We have received a local paper containing an account of a reception given to him by the church at Creston.

During the month of November, the Church Extension Board received $1 106.35 from the following sources: Individuals, $505.30; Churches, $601.06. Last November, there was received: Individuals, $1,440.20; Churches, $393.47. This is a loss of $934.90 from individuals and a gain of $207.59 from the churches.

The statistical report for the Sunday-schools of St. Louis shows that there are 336 schools of all denominations in the city, with 68,533 scholars and 4,627 teachers. The Disciples of Christ have 15 Sunday-schools with 3,394 scholars and 266 teachers. There are eight denominations which have more schools than we have.

The Home Board has no missionary among the Indians, none in Alaska, only one among the Mexicans, only one among the Scandinavians in this country, and none speaking any other foreign language except German. T. H. Timme, our missionary among the Germans, has orgatized two German churches in Cleveland, O. He will soon start another and will then go elsewhere.

On December 2, the Second Church at Rochester, N. Y., dedicated its new Sunday-school chapel and celebrated the third anniversary of its existence. Corey is pastor.

The church at State Line, Ind., has received a valuable bequest from Brother Benjamin Franklin Bonebrake of that congregation, lately deceased. The income of the land is to be applied exclusively to the minister's salary. The lightening of its burden at home gives it an opportunity to abound conspicuously in missionary offerings. H. A. Wingard is pastor.

During the present month a series of Sunday afternoon entertainments are being given—concerts and illustrated lectures. Chicago Commons has made itself a center of sweetness and light and Christian culture in its neighborhood.

The executive committee of the School of Pastoral Helpers has elected A. M. Harvuot, president; Geo. A. Miller, vice-president; J. H. Fillmore, treasurer; and Lottie S. Nicho!, secretary. They decided to move the school from the Central Church, Cincinnati, to quarters of its own. It is now nicely located on the second floor of the Goodall building, next door to the church. The students have organized a literary society, and have arranged to furnish the new apartments and start a library. It has been decided to receive, at the opening of the next term, only young women who are well educated and have had experience in church work.

WHEN SHE FOUND COFFEE WAS SLOWLY KILLING-HER.

Even a temperate mode of living in regard to food beverages will not avail if the use of coffee is continued.

A Virginia lady, Mrs. R. F. Miller, of Badford City, says that she was very temperate in every way. "I did not suspect that coffee was the polson that was undermining my whole nervous system, causing a condition of vertigo and head aches, until the attacks became so frequent and violent that I was compelled to give up all kinds of work and forced to lie down most of the time.

"My attention was drawn to Postum Food Coffee by the experience of some others in regard to common coffee, and the thought occurred to me that perhaps coffee was the cause of my trouble, so I began to use Postum, being careful to have it made according to the directions on the package.

"I did not have to cultivate a taste for it; for I found on the start that it was a most delicious beverage.

"Day after day I continued to improve but did not dream that it would be such a help, and never since the day I left off coffee and commenced the use of Postum Food Coffee (about nine months ago) have I had any return of the trouble. I have used no medicine or tonic during this time, and my present condition of magnificent health is due entirely to the use of Postum Food Coffee.

"I have heard several persons say they did not like Postum but in each case I discovered upon inquiry that it was because they tried to make it like common coffee, that is, to boil it four or five minutes. This will not do, for one cannot get the delicious flavor and the food value in so short boiling. The directions are plain enough, and it only requires a little patience to bring out the heautiful flavor.

"The doctors find Postum one of their most valuable aids in their treatment of cases like mine."

As a part of its attempt to raise a Jubilee Fund of $200,000, the Foreign Missionary Society calls for one hundred thousand One Dollar Volunteers; i. e., for that number who will increase their last year's contribution of one dollar. Pastors are requested to act as recruiting agents and send for the eurollment cards, which may be had by addressing A. McLean or F. M. Rains, Cincinnati,

The new church at Delta, Iowa, was dedicated by A. M. Haggard of D:ake University on Dec. 2. It is reported by George C. Ritchey, of Keota, to be a handsome edifice with a seating capacity of 650. W. T. Fisher is in the third year of his pastorate there, during which time there have been about 125 additions to the church. He and his wife are both graduates of Cotner. The money for the new church was all raised before dedication day.

The contract for the new Central Church at Denver has been let. It will be one of the handsomest churches in the brotherhood. The entire amount needed to pay for it has been subscribed, and it is expected that the $5,000 required for furnishing will be raised before dedication day. Four of the down-town churches in Denver held a union Thanksglving service at Temple Immanuel at which Bruce Brown spoke on Religious Progress During the Nineteenth Century.

B. B. Tyler has been engaged to write a series of articles for the Congregationalist (Boston) on Movements and Events Among the Disciples of Christ. They will appear in the monthly "Christian World" number. Brother Tyler reports that he has turned the Wednesday evening prayermeeting in his church at Denver into a meeting for systematic Bible study, the books of the New Testament being read in chronological order. At the v-ry first session under this plan the meeting overflowed the lecture room and had to adjourn to the main auditorium.

At the meeting of the Board of Church Extension, on Tuesday, December 4th, loans to sixteen different churches were granted, aggregating $13,350. These loans were distributed through thirteen different states. The following is a list of the churches, and amounts granted: Doniphan, Mo., $400; Holland, Tex., $250; Fellowship, Fla, $100; Greenwood, Mich., $125; Asheville, N. C., $1,000; North Side Church, Chicago, Ill, $6,000; Latonia, Ky, $750; Grand Junction, Col., $500; Green Mound, O. T., $150; Central Church, Stanford, Tex., $150; Second Church, Wheeling, W. Va., $2,000; Billings, O. T, $490; Coyle, O. T., $400; Nora, Neb, $400; Wilber, Neb., $600; and Frederick, Kan., $125

Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America was quite generally and profitably observed. The Sunday-school at Carthage, O, gave the concert exercise and raised $25 40. The school at Huntingsburg, Ind., sent $8.43. Seward, Neb., gave the exercise and took the collection-a fair exchange to everybody's advantage. Eaton, Ind., sends $6.00. The school at California, Mo., with an attendance of 262, raised $14.50. Rain hindered at Mentor, O., as in many other places, but $6.00 was secured for American Missions. Kensington and Rossville, Kan., were both delighted with the exercise and send in their offerings. There was bad weather at Samsville, Ill., too, but they kept the day. The school at Delta, O., sends $10.00. A high place of honor belongs to the little mission school, six months old, at Daytona, Fla., which kept the day and made an offering of $2.00

Thank God Our Debts Are Paid.

On Saturday, the 24th inst, the Beard of Directors of Daughters' College met, pursuant to a called meeting, at Fulton, and the entire indebtedness of the Institution, now amounting to nearly $36,000, was paid off. The debt at the bank was compromised for $17,500 -the school owing that institution, with interest, nearly $30,000; and the other clain amounted to $5,950.

Steps were taken by which the site of the College will hereafter be forever free from liability to debt. It can never stand good for any debts that may be contracted by the management of the institution. It can not be mortgaged. The outlook is exceedingly encouraging. By the payment of $23,300 the site of the institution with all furniture is saved. This could not be replaced for less than $40,000. We save the scholarships, amounting to at least $10,000; we save the bequest of Alexander Breckenridge, amounting to $15,000; we save the real estate at Higginsville, worth $2,500; besides bequests that have been made to us by a number of persons. probably amounting to $100,000 more.

Over two years ago the president of the institution tried to induce Dr. W. S. Woods, of Kansas City, to wipe out the entire debt and permit his name to be given to the institution. He has been a staunch friend of the institution for years having made the largest donation ever made to it. Nearly eight years ago he gave a piece of property in Kansas City to the school, which cost him $50,000. For no fault of his the property has depreciated in value and has never been the source of profit to the school that was anticipated. He is now in hearty sympathy with the institution and the purpose for which it exists, and through the influence of his wife he has consented that his name shal be given to it. It is believed that the institution will be generously endowed at no distant day. The Board of Directors, in view of the generous assistance which has been given to the school and the friendship of Dr. Woods and his wife, decided to change the name from Daughters College to William Woods College for Girls. The school will be placed upon a new footing entirely, without a change of purpose or ownership. It is proposed to establish an Annuity Fund and Memorial Chairs. It is firmly believed that there are many persons who desire at their death to make bequests to the school and during the latter days of their lives to be relieved of the care of managing their business affairs; and if they could be guaranteed that their property was safely invested, and that they would receive an annual income adequate to their support, would transfer their property to the school while they live. A committee has been appointed, consisting of Dr. W. S. Woods, Kansas City, J. T. Mitchell, Centralia, and George A. Mahan, Hannibal, constituting a Finance Committee, who will have the management of the property of the school.

It also gives us pleasure to say that James M. Sandusky, who has been a staunch friend of the institution from the beginning and one of its most liberal donors in the payment of its debts, and the constant legal adviser of the school, will continue the trustee of the Breckenridge farm, valued at $15,000, or the proceeds that may be derived from the sale of it-the same to constitute a separate fund known as the "Breckenridge Fund," for the education of orphan girls, according to the will.

The people throughout the state may be assured that the school will enter upon an era of enlarged usefulness. At present there are ninety-six boarders in the institution and the benevolent feature of it continues to dominate the whole school, although many of the patrons are wealthy people. It is the purpose of the management to more fully equip the school in every respect, and that it shall continue to merit the generous patronage which it has heretofore received. They also hope to add to it many new features at some date not far off. We hope to have a Jubilee in which there shall be represented all interests connected with the school and the church throughout the state, in which the ownership of the property shall remain forever vested.

J. B. JONES, President.

Ministerial Relief.

One of the best known authorities on the work of Ministerial Relief, as to its importance and benefits, is that individual who speaks the experience of his own heart. That man who, because of sacrifice, sickness, misfortune, or all combined. finds himself nearing the sunset of life, with nowhere to lay his head, and no income to meet the necessities of life, who has been saved from a greater suffering and a deeper sorrow by the help the Board of Ministerial Relief gave him, is the man who speaks with undeniable authority. And here is the kind of man of whom I am speaking: "I am now ninety-three years old. I am almost helpless, and I have no help only what you give me." This man knows the necessity, the importance and the benefit of even the little he is receiving. He speaks out of a sad, and at the same time, joyful experience. And no one knows better than those who know.

Think of it, brethren, a man who has preached the gospel of Christ for more than a half century, who made great sacrifices during all these years, who pioneered the way through the doubts and difficulties of a bitter and blinding sectarianism, making the glorious present and the still more glorious future a possibility, that any such valiant soldier, in feetle, helpless old age, should want, not only for the comforts, but even the necessities of life, is one, if not the one thing that casts the shadow of its horrid visage upon the glories of our marvelous victories. God holds us responsible here. This thing must not be so longer. These faithful old fathers and mothers in Israel must have our appreciative consideration. We owe it to God, to them, to ourselves, and to the cause we hold so dear. The world looks on. The double charge of selfishness and ingratitude will hold against us until from our abundance we provide for their needs and comforts.

Only when there are none among us lacking life's necessities, will primitive Christianity have been restored. Only when we delight in helping those who need our help will we be like the Master. Only under the inspiration of such spi it will we ourselves be truly happy. This essential element in Christianity is perhaps best expressed by saying, giving is receiving.

Every church in the brotherhood is indebted to these worthy brethren. Third Lord's day in December ought to be one of the great days of the year. It has been set apart to the holiest of holy ministries, and ought to be sacredly kept. It is easily the day of all the set days of the year for the deepening of spirituality in the churches, and should not be neglected anywhere. Let us look to these interests with ready minds and liberal hands. If the preacher will interest himself in this matter, he can easily interest his people. and do them, as well as the old brethren, a great good. We will be glad to send our last annual report to any one who will make judicious distribution of them in his congregation. If the people know of this work they will be interested in it, and will support it.

This will be our last call before the day for the offering. Brethren, come to the help of the Lord's needy.

A. L. ORCUTT, Cor. Sec.

OUR DUTY TO MNASON.

Mnason, of Cyprus, whom Luke describes as "an old disciple," was one of the seventy, and one of our Lord's own converts. He had a home of his own, and Paul lodged with him at Jerusalem. He was an aged and retired preacher and as he could extend his hospitality to the Apostle, we conclude he at least had a roof over his head, and an extra couch where Paul could rest after his la-

Mnason was fortunate. No doubt there were those of this original band of preachers who, in old age and retirement from active service, were without these comforts. The church provided for them. Even their enemies bear testimony to their faithfulness in this respect. "These Galileans," said Julian the Apostate, "nour shed not only their own poor, but ours as well." "It is incredble," said Lucian, who jeered and scoffed at Christianity, "to see the ardor with which these Christians help each other in their wants. They spare nothing. Their first legislator put it into their heads that they are all brethren." When called by their enemies to show the most precious treasures of the church, they showed them the sick, the lame, the blind.

Was not this New Testament Christianity, Primitive Christianity, Apostolic Christianity, the "Ancient Order of Things?" Hear Paul: "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." "Concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order, let every one of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him." "We should remember the poor." "Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things." Especially should this care be exercised by the church for the infirm and the aged who may be in want. It is a precept as old as Moses, "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head and honor the face of the old man, and fear thy God."

Mnason may be without lodging place; or Mnason may have closed his career, and left one, aged and helpless, who worked with him through his long discipleship; or Mnason may have little children that are struggling alone with poverty because the old disciple was unable after his long and unselfish service for the church to leave them provided for. Shall we be unmindful of him and his, ungrateful for his self-denying and useful labors? May we not, out of our abundance, remember the old preachers, and the preacher's wife, and the preacher's child?

If Paul, the aged, crippled, and needy, were in our streets, or should come to our church doors, would we not joyfully minister to him? And shall Mnason, the "old disciple" who helped forward, even in a humble way, the great cause of which Paul was the chief champion, be deserted by his brethren? "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

F. D. POWER.

A TENDER, LOVING MINISTRY.

One of the most tender and loving works of the church of our Lord Jesus Christ is that of ministering to the wants of the aged preachers who have come near to the sunset of life, and who find themselves without means to provide for their families, and for themselves.

The writer is not one of the pioneer preachers of the Reformation, neither does he belong to that class of noble, God-fearing young men who have taken up the work of the Fathers, and who are carrying it on so successfully; but he is old enough to remember the pioneers. His life laps back over part of their lives. He well remembers how these men of God, of whom the world was not worthy, went out into localities where the plea for a return to New Testament Christianity had never been made, and where there were no churches to pay the n for their work, and how they preached the gospel and planted churches at their own expense. A few of them still linger among us. Some of them with their aged companions are almost destitute. Can we live in ease, and gather wealth around us, and let these fathers suffer for the common blessings of life?

The Value Of Charcoal,

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of the solozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in the stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordidary charcoal tablets."

lief will be a generous one. We are thworthy children of such a parentage unless we give liberally as God has blessed us for a purpose so holy and divine. Brethren, if we are apostolic in faith, let us be equally apostolic in practice. When we are that, the poor saints will be cared for.

HELP THE NEEDY.

The servants of the Lord are all one. Those that labor in word and teaching are certainly worthy of their share in the prosperity of all. The aged and wornout servants are the ones, above all others, entitled to have their needs supplied No appeal comes to the churches and ministers with more force than that of Ministerial R-lief. I have been so associated with it that I know its value and it may truly be called the "Ministry of the Saints." It is in harmony with all the nobler sentiments of the human heart. A single verse of a poem a hundred years old is the strongest expression I can give:

"Pity the sorrows of a poor old man,
Whose days of labor for the Lord are o'er,
Whose time is dwindled to the shortest span,
O, give relief and heaven will bless your store."

D. R. Lucas.

Indianapolis, Ind., Dec. 1, 1900.

A HOLY MINISTRY.

"Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things." To deny the faithful servant of Jesus Christ, who has spent his life in dispensing the blessings of the gospel to men, an adequate support, is to violate this plain injunction of the word of God. Not a grudging pittance, doled out to him as a charity but "all good things," paid to him as well-earned compensation for his toil, is the divine law. If churches obey this command as loyally as they require their ministers to observe the duties pertaining to their holy office, we should hear of fewer needy preachers. But, since the churches so generally fail in this duty, they ought to do the next best thing, and provide for the age and want of these devoted ministers of the Lord Jesus, by placing in the hands of our Board of Ministerial Relief abundant funds to meet all such necessities. No more blessed ministry, and none that is more gratefully received, have we among us. Every congregation and preacher ought to be on the list of regular contributors.

W. F. RICHARDSON.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Dr. T. B. Neely, head of the Bible-school work of the Methodist Church, South, is issuing a Home Department Journal, pushing this feature of the work as it should be, right to the front, and our brethren must awake to it sooner or later, and the sooner, the better, friends.

Our evangelist in the southwest district, who is trying to plant the gospel permanently in the destitute places of his district, is now at Wishart, on the extension of the 'Frisco, and present indications are that there will be a house of God in the place before January, also a new congregation of disciples and a working Bible-school.

The South Street, Springfield, Bible-school Rally, was one of the biggest and best half days I have had this fall. The program was well handled and happily executed. Pastor Moore and those laboring with him were fully compensated for all their hard work by the glad results, while the American Society and State Bible-school work were to receive the results of the offering. That night Brother D. W. Moore was going to add fifty dollar volunteers to our dollar fund, but the rain ruined our meeting; pastor said the $50 will come by next June.

We have been worely pressed this month, so that the remittance in full from the California school was a double blessing to us. We could not have paid the November salaries to some of the men without it, and can not pay some of the others without your help, dear friend. Will you not do as did C. C. Hill?

Fred F. Schultz has created such an interest in Montgomery county that nearly every school in the county has applied for his help. New Florence is taking on new life, the citizens joining in the Normal Bible study. The field collections of our brother show the people appreciate him.

John Gidders is now at Thayer helping the school for a few days, thence he goes to Alton, county seat of Oregon. But few county seats remain in which we have no house, and with our state mission workers, we hope to soon see these few with good buildings.

F. A. Mayhall, with his usual farsightedness, saw the good of the Bible-school Rally, and immediately planned for one at Vandalia and Union. The offering taken, with the school apportionment, will make Vandalia one of the banner schools of Missouri.

John Giddens is now at Alton, county seat of Oregon, where he hopes to permanently establish the cause of Christ by helping them raise the money for a house of God, for the work there will never be rightly established until the house is erected, and we hope to see it done before the cold weather sets in.

Our rally at Union (Ralls) revealed some things to your servant of which he must speak. First, C. C. Hill was visiting his parents there and held a meeting in the school house near by, and from this meeting we now have an excellent congregation, one of the nicest houses in the county, a Bible school and no debt. Again, the little band was very fortunate in their selection of ministers, for the leading has been such as resulted in this remarkable and happy growth. Again, it has come largely from the nurturing care of J. B. Corwine.

(From "Smiles Yoked with Sighs," by Robert J. Burdette.)

What shall we do when the good days come When the croaking prophets' lips are dunb? When the man who reads us his "fittle things," Has lost his voice with the dole it brings; When stilled is the breath of the whistling man, And the yells of the campaign marching clan; And the neighbor's children have lost their drums

Oh, what shall we do when the good time comes?

Oh, what shall we do in that good, blithe time, When the tramp will work—oh, thought sublime!
When the scornful dame with the weary feet
Will 'thank you, s.r." for the pr ffered seat; When the man you sir, for the pr fiered seat When the man you hire to work by the day Wil let you do his work your way; When the office boy will call you "Sir," Instead of "Soy" and "Governor"; When the funny man is hum rsome-On, how can we stand the millenoium?

STRUGGLING TOWARD THE LIGHT.

BY WALTER S. SMITH.

Chap. VII.-Further Details of the Meeting.

February 24th was the Lord's day. No sun ever shone more brightly on the frozen earth at the close of winter. Paul had received a pressing call to preach an afternoon sermon at Homo, the village east of Luzon, where Timothy's other charge was situated. There were several members of the Luzon church there who had purchased the unused school-house and arranged to have preaching there by the Luzon preacher, and the breaking of the loaf on Sunday afternoons. This was especially agreeable, inasmuch as twenty five or thirty of them lived there and could not always attend at the larger place. Nor was this the whole, nor even the principal reason for an occasional separate meeting. It enabled these workers to condu t there a Sunday-school; and so, too, they c uld bring the ministry of the gospel to a goodly number of people who thus enjoyed attending and hearing.

As the Luz in congregation had been for several months without preaching, they were hungry at Homo for a sermon, and Paul readily assented to their request. On such a beautiful day, he felt that the influence of the meeting ought to be dispensed over as wide a territory as possible; and he left Timothy to preach an afternoon sermon and baptize the ten or more candidates, while he broke bread to those at Homo. The sight of the three Tnarpes marching together into the water-Miss Jessie in the middle, Louise on the left and the younger brother on the right-was beautiful to see. They were tastily and simply arrayed, and all were adorned with humility. All were waited on before either of them came from the water; so they came up out of the water in the order of their entrance. The countenance of Miss Jessie showed plainly that her victory over her obstacles was just now making her happy.

Paul prepared a discourse on what he called "The Evidence of Plain Facts." His text was the Savior's thrust at the Pharisees: "What think ye of the Christ? Whose Son is he?" Matt. 22:42. "This question's object," said he, "was not to ascertain what they thought of him, but what they thought of the exp cted Messiah;" he proceeded to make an application: "What would you think of an individual in his several aspects, biographically stated?" The analysis of the sermon was thus along the line of his life, and the effort was to show a character unaccountable, unless on the hypothesis of his divinity.

What would you think:

- 1. Of a child in a little village, and in a poor family, that created a great national panic?
 - 2. Of a lad confounding the lawyers?
 - 3. Of the marvelous baptism?
 - Of a life of miracle and teaching?
 - 5. Of a line of prophecies fulfi led?
- 6. Of the crucifixion and its attendant phenomena?
 - 7. Of the resurrection?

The chief feature of interest was that the sermon was an active factor in moving Silas in his return to his discarded faith. Silas declared that the simple story had more in it than the average argument to convince.

Prof. Guthrie, in the discourse, took the bold ground that no man of good mind can look attentively upon the facts of Christ's life without a conclusion in favor of its divinity. And he further asserted that all Unitarian and Rati nalistic explanations fail for the want of cogency and faithfulnes, to common logic. The ease with which he applied the rules of the syllogism made a most profound impression. It put to silence the conceited vaporings of a certain medical character in Luzon, who delighted in the reputation of an agnostic. But, as is too often the case, instead of convicting the heathen of his sin, it only made him angry, caused him to stay at home and stamped him as Guthrie's enemy for all time.

Speaking of this agnostic suggests that Luzon had its characters—the physicians, the shoe-maker, the butcher, the bachelors, the hotel keepers, the merchants, the maidens, the widows, the cripples, the orphans, verily, there was a little world right in Luzon. From this endless array of peculiar dispositions there was made up as attentive an au lience as man ever addressed. There was a change from moonlight nights to nights very dark, and from smooth, frozen roads to the deepest and blackest of mud. And as all three men were, just at this time, so hoarse from much singing and speaking that they had to give up their special songs, Paul fully expected the attendance to fall off and the interest to subside. But, from somewhere, in some manner, the people flocked in, in sufficient numbers to fill the large room. The interest abated not in the small st degree.

The inexperienced evangelist made one serious mistake. He allowed himself to register an appointment for a meeting in another place, to begin on the second day of March. Then he announced to the people at Luzon that he must quit on the first of March to fill this appointment. So the meeting at Luzon closed in the midst of its usefulness, with thirty nine accessions, and as many more who would have been accessions. But Paul was sensitive, and a mere hint from the raven-voiced wife of one of the elders sufficed to make him feel that he ought to leave Luzon, "before he wore the people out." It was a grievous error, and it is always an error to fix a limit to a meeting in advance. Nobody knows what the interest may be at the date assigned for closing.

Before leaving Luzon, let us give an idea of Timothy's preaching. He had so good a memory that he needed no notes before him, being able to remember all the outline and present it in its order. He was fond of a series of sermons; as shown in seven day meetings of which he had charge. He based each day's lesson upon one of the letters written to the seven churches. He showed much sk ll in deriving moral and religious lessons and applying them to present day membership.

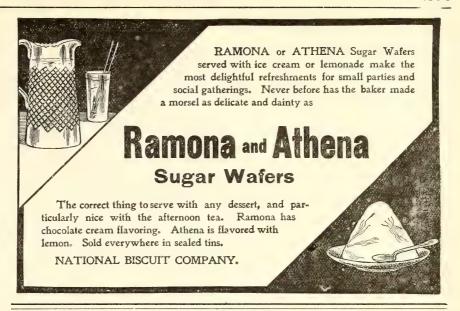

He made, for instance, a point like this when discussing the duty of a church or an individual in relation to what is written: "We are not to be excused for failing to heed what is written, simply because we have not read it; it is our duty to read it. I once canvassed a sister in the interest of the Baptist Recorder. This is a good paper, and Baptist families, in Kentucky, very generally take it. But this good sister could not subscribe. She said she had subscribed for one paper for her boys, and as that had cost her three dollars, she could not afford to take another. I did not suppose she would make a fatal mistake, and so I did not ask her what paper she had bought at so high a price. But as I passed out of the door, the wind blew up a corner of a curtain that hid a recess near-by, and what do you think I saw? A stack six or eight inches thick, of that delectable magazine called The Police Gazette! The Police Gazette, with all its filth and lechery; with all its infidelity and its lascivious pictures; with all its vile suggestions! I observed the conduct of her two boys, and I found them the toughest boys about the Bend. They would stand and talk at the church door and smoke at the windows; would come inside in bad weather and crack peanuts all through the prayer; and, of course, they were leaders in all forms of Sunday desecration.

"Their end came all too soon; for one went to the penitentiary for forging and theft, and the other was drugged and robbed in a brothel and his helpless body was laid on the rail of a wharf boat, whence the waves of a large steamer shook him into the water.

"Ah, friends! This silly sister paid for her indiscretion, even though she did not read what was written to the churches! The language is, 'He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches.'"

"Shunning Difficulties."

(Illustrated Sermon.)

I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. And this I do for the gospel's sake. 1 Cor. 9:22, 23.

Distances and difficulties are alike deceptive. The moun ain range that is seen from a distance, lying just above the horizon, does not seem to present any obstacle to the proposed transcontinental railroad, but when the distance has been overcome the difficulties become apparent and the skill and knowledge of a practical civil engineer are needed to reduce them to a minimum.

The easiest and most direct way of reaching any given point is not often by an "air line." It is frequently more expeditious to make a detour around the mountain when building a railroad than to tunnel through it or to go directly over it. Just how much resistance there will be from the flinty granite, or how great the expense will be to drive a tunnel through a mountain, can never be even approximately foretold, and when it is not absolutely necessary that a tunnel be constructed it is decidedly cheaper and better to turn aside and cross the range by following the "pass."

APPLICATION.

Viewed from a distance it may not appear to be a difficult thing to preach the gospel and convert men, but a trial, when in close contact with the unsaved, will convince the most credulous that it is no easy task to be successful. There are great mountain ranges of prejudice, ignorance, selfishness, superstition and error, as well as grosser forms of evil, that must in some way be surmounted, and to do this requires all the ability and ingenuity that one can command. It is often wiser not to attempt to drive a tunnel for righteousness by positive aggressiveness or inconsiderate combativeness directly through these serried barriers, but to find the places of least resistance and by conciliatory measures, without surrendering or compromising the truth, reach the heart with the message of salvation. A valuable lesson can be learned from the Apostle Paul, who for the gospel's sake became "all things to all men, that he might by all means save some," but who never failed to preach the gospel in its fullness to both Jew and Gentile.

Attitude of Railroads.

PROMPT ASSISTANCE RENDERED BY THEM AT GALVESTON.

The popular belief that large corporations are relentless under all circumstances where profits are at stake, has received a gratifying "shock" in so far as the attitude of the railroads since the Galveston storm is concerned, as the following will show: Just now the railroad, express and telegraph companies are doing no little toward the relief of the Galveston sufferers, and deserve due credit for what they are doing. It's true they have large business interests there, and suffer from a financial standpoint, but it is due these companies, soul or no soul, to say they can and do do a great good when there is suffering to be relieved.

This is true and just. But for the prompt generosity of these corporations in such emergencies the suffering would be multiplied many fold. And it is not only the promptness with which they respond, but the free transportation of supplies and all things necessary to alle iate the suffering, whether provided by governmental or individual charity, that deserves commendation. It costs as much to run trains for such occasions as it does to run similar trains for profit. Yet there is not a railroad company or an express or telegraph company in the land that would not be and has not been prompt to render every such service that the emergency could call for without price. When the Philadelphia Press intimated the other day that it had nurses and medical supplies and a trainload of provisions for Galveston, these things had scarcely been gathered together before the Southern had its train of cars and comfortable coaches at the Quaker City depot, and so soon as all could be loaded and gotten aboard was speeding through the South, with absolute rightof-way of trackage, on its mission of mercy. It is due to say that either of the other great systems reaching into the South would have cheerfully performed the same service to the extent of its system.

Authors in Parliament.

English men of letters seem to find nothing incongruous in literary and political activities. In the new parliament just chosen there are not only a number of journalists and newspaper proprietors, such as Mr. Labouchere, Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. T. P. O'Connor, but not a few authors of wide reputation.

Mr. John Morley, who has just published a life of Oliver Cromwell and is busily engaged upon a life of Mr. Gladstone; Mr. W. H. H. Lecky, one of the most distinguished of contemporary historians; Mr. James Bryce, whose history of "The American Commonwealth" has won wide appreciation in the United States for its candor and accuracy; and Sir R. C. Jebb, the Oxford professor and author of a noteworthy translation of Sophocles, are among the older group who served in the old Parliament and have been re-elected to the new. Mr. Arthur J. Balfour, the government leader in the House of Commons, has written books of essays and philosophical discussion, and might write more if politics did not keep him busy.

Mr. Augustine Birrell, one of the brighest of living essayists, whose del cate humor enlivened debates in the old Parliament, will be missed in the new. He gave up a safe constituency to contest a difficult one, and was defeated. Mr. Barrie, author of many well-known novels, and Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, better known in literature by the first two-thirds of his real name, were announced as candidates, but withdrew on account of ill health; and Dr. A. Conan Doyle, the creator of "Sherlock Holnes," was defeated because the constituency to which he appealed preferred a Liberal to a Conserva-But the list of younger authors elected includes Mr. Gilbert Parker, the successful novelist; Mr. Henry Norman, author of books of travel in the far East; and Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill, who is known both as a war correspondent and as a writer of excellent books descriptive of military campaigns .- Youth's Companion.

Among the advertisements in a London paper there recently appeared the following:

"The gentleman who found a purse with money in the High Street is requested to forward it to the address of the loser, as he was recognized."

A few days afterwards this reply was inserted:

"The recognized gentleman who picked up a purse in High Street requests the loser to call at his house."

PETE.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

VI.-How the Black Lady Turned White.

"But I didn't come up here to tell you a story a tall," said Pete, "I came on business."

"Now, I'm glad you told me that," said the tramp. "I'll know how to meet you. I supposed you was makin a friendly call, that's how come I to be relegating my fairy stories to your ears. But if it's business, Miss Prudence, I'll be business, too. And business calls should be brief as your spellin'book says; so don't take up no more of my time than you kin help. My time's all I got, so just nachully I don't want to be wastin' none of it on business. It's just like the man that lived by the river and he had ten sheep. So one morning he found two sheep missing, and the next morning two more was gone, and the next morning two more, which was six. But the man was so very pore that he had only his sheep to make a living by, and he had a pretty little daughter with golden hair to support."

"I wish you would not begin another story," said Pete, "because I get all interested and that takes my mind off of what I came up here in the loft to say."

"I don't intend to bother nobody with my stories," returned Nap with dignity. "I was only going to add that on the fourth morning the man got up very, very early for to see if he could ketch what it was a taking his sheep, two and two. So he crep' out to the paschur afore day, and lo and behold! there stood a woman all dressed in black. A beautiful young lady she was, with raven black hair. She held up a wand and two of the sheep took out and followed her off and off and away and away, tell she led them to the river-bank. The man crep' along to see what she'd do. But I'm just a-waiting, Miss Prudence, for you to tell me your business."

"But what did the beautiful young lady do?" demanded Pete.

"So she drawed out a golden knife with a diamond a-twinkling a-top of the handle, and cut both the sheep's throats, a-catching their blood in a silver basin. Then she drawed up the skirt of her dress and they not being no shoes nor stockings adorning her limbs, if you will excuse me, the man seen that one foot and leg was jet black and t'other was snow white. But I'm afeerd I'm a-keeping you, Miss Prudence."

"I hope you will not stop there, Nap," said Pete, "for this is better than the 'Wollo, wollo' story."

"So what does the beautiful young lady do but take her black leg and begin to wash it in the hot, reeking blood of them two sheep. And as she washed and washed, it got whiter'n' whiter, tell when the last drap of blood had been utilized, it was white clur down to her ankle-bone, if you will excuse me. Then she up and throwed the sheep's corpses into the rollin' river. But just as she was preparin' to go, the man pounced upon her and grabbed her by the arm and cried out, 'I'hem's my sheep! You have done taken and killed eight of 'em, and I've only two left, and now my poor little goldenhaired daughter will starve to death!' 'Never you be ekeered,' says she when she had got over her surprise. 'To-morrow I'll come and git your last two sheep and wash my foot in their blood and then I'll be a beautiful marble white,' says she, 'all over, barring my raven black hair. Listen to my story,' says she: 'On:e I was a fair white maiden, but a wicked witch turned me jet black because the prince loved me and she wanted him herself, the witch did. But the prince loved me, until I was black. So I went to a fairy to see what to do, and I was told that the blood of ten sheep, took two and two, would restore me to my original hue,' says she. 'And when I've married the prince, I'll make your golden haired little daughter my maid of honor, and you shall be my Head Butler,' says she. And she done it, too. Everything turned out according to program and the string band played a chune and everybody went home."

"But," said Pete, "why would sheep's blood do the turning better than other blood?"

"Sheep's blood makes sheep white," he returned; "I guess it'd make her white. Nothin's as white as wool you know, and it's blood what makes the wool to be a-growing."

"Well, was she a negro when she was turned black, Nap?"

"I don't know as you could say she was a negro, Miss Prudence; it's other things aside the color that makes crows crows."

"Do you reckon she was glad when that last foot got marble white and she looked and saw that she was white all over, except her raven black hair? Oh, Nap! I wonder what she said when the prince came expecting to see her jet black, and found out that she was so sweet and beautiful! Wasn't he glad, then! And I am glad about the golden haired little daughter too. But I don't think being a head butler was very safe, was it? The only head butler I know about had a pretty bad time of it When he wasn't in jail, he had to pass a cup about; and he was in the Bible, too!"

"Well, butlers have easier times in these days, Miss Prudence. All my head butler had to do was to draw his pay and see that others done the work. Besides, we ain't so shure that that there Bible butler had to pass arry cup. You see we air finding out heaps of things in Scripture that us high critics,—and I'm one of the highest, I reckon,—has our doubts on."

"Oh, Nap! Do you mean that you don't believe what's in the Bible?"

"Well, Miss Prudence, I don't want to say nothing to worry you, and besides, I got to be a-goin', for your ma's breakfast must be near ready and I don't want to be found here so late. So let me down the ladder, please mom. But as I was a-saying, I'm a high

"Oh, Nap! Then you ain't a Christian?"
"I'm afraid not," said Nap, who now stood upon the ground beside the little girl.

"Maybe you are a Catholic?" she suggested. (That would be better than nothing).

"Not even a Catholic. Well, good-by, Miss Prudence. I have passed a lovely morning and I wish the same to you."

"But Nap, but Oh, Nap, if you will just let me tell you how we wish you would go away, because poor mamma is getting pale and sick! She is so terribly worried over your being here, and we are poor, -and how can we give you a hundred dollars and have enough to live on? You know how to be so nice and kind, and you can tell such lovely stories with scary places all over them. And would you be willing for mamma who has only girls to help her, and no son, and papa is dead,-and would you take her money when she has so little? You don't know how good and kind she is, and willing to help you, too, if she was able, and how happy we all were before you came, -the happiest little family in the country! I don't see how a man who can tell the stories you can would be willing to make such a family all sad. And Oh, Nap, I have some things,some lovely things, and so has Madge and Jennie, and wouldn't you take them and go

"You bring 'em up here to-morrow morning," said Nap, "and I'll take a peep at 'em; just you, alone, Miss Prudence. I don't make no promises, but I'll see what kin be done." So saying be made her a low bow and went away, chuckling.

THE VISIT OF THE WISE MEN.*

It was a time of great anxiety and distress in Judea. Herod, whose title of "the great" is due to his military prowess and political sagacity, was as contemptible a ruler as ever sat upon a throne, judged by his personal character and career. Insanely jealous for his throne, he put to death without remorse every one who might in any way become his rival. Besides many of the noblest of his subjects, he murdered his sons, Alexander, Aristobulus. Antipater and his favorite wife, the beautiful Mariamne, the only human being he seems ever to have really loved. Hated by the whole people, crazy with fear of the revenge of those whom he had wronged, tormented by the most loathsome disease, conscious that he must quickly die, and that his death would bring universal rejoicing to the nation, it is little wonder that Jerusalem was full of troubled hearts. Suddenly the city was startled by the news that a company of wise men from the east had entered Jerusalem, inquiring for the birthplace of the Messlah, whom they called by the familiar title of King of the Jews Much speculation has been indulged in on the subject of these magi, and fintion and art have made free use of imagination in depicting their persons and history. We know but little about them from the sacred record. Their number is not given, nor is their specific country named. Because of their threefold gifts, they are often pictured as three in number. Fancy has represented them as coming from the three then known continents of Asia, Africa and Europe and from the three branches of the human race, children of Shem, Ham and Japheth. But this is evidently not warranted by the record. They came from the east, not the south and west. They were most likely dwellers in Persia, and members of the priestly caste, to whom the title of magi was commonly applied.

The relation between Jews and Persians was for many centuries very close. The happiest period of the exile was that spent under Persian rule. Indeed, the reason why so few Jews returned to Palestine, when permission was given by Cyrus, was that they were so happily situated and granted so many privileges among the people of that empire. Among all the gentiles, the Persians possessed the purest form of religion. They utterly rejected all the baser forms of idolatry, and their worsh p of the heavenly bodies was akin rather to the reverence, with which a good Catholic bows before an image of the Virgin, than to the abject superstition that marked the common worship of idols. They looked on these as symbols of the spiritual powers from which proceeded life and its blessings. Many of them had long before the time of Christ accopted the purer religion of the Jews; and, while still attributing to the portents of the sky a mysterious power of revelation, yet worshiped the true God, and waited in hope for the Messiah who should bring glory and power to the now subject and scattered people of his choice The heart of Israel was throbbing with expectation. The literature of this period, between the time of Daniel and that of Jesus, was increasingly occupied with the Messianic hope. Of these apocryphal books it has been truly said: "Burning hope glows through them, like fire through clouds, revealing the feverish concentration of heart and thought of all Israel on this one grand expectation.'

These strange visitors from the east declared that they had seen in their far-away home, shining in the heavens, some wonderful star, which they could only interpret as a signal of the coming of the long-expected Messiah. The Jews were wont to repeat the prophecy of Balaam, "There shall come forth a star out of Jacob," as evidence that his coming would be preceded by such a sign. Balaam himself was a dweller in that very land, and the magi were his successors in the priestly and prophetic office among the people. Both nations would understand alike any strange stellar phenomenon. All nations shared in this superstition Josephus tells us that for a whole year before the fall of Jerusalem a star, in the shape of a sword-doubtless a comet-hung over the doomed city. A like portent is noted by Suctonius as immediately preceding the death of Cæsar. If the sign in this case was a natural phenomenon it was probably, as has been conjectured, a conjunction of the planets Jupiter, Saturn and Mars, which is reckoned by astronomers to have occurred about two years before the birth of Christ, and which would have been viewed with great interest and wonder by the oriental nations. Whatever the cause of the appearance in the sky, it was interpreted as we have said, and these earnest and reverent seekers after God made the long journey into Judea, that they might find and worship the newborn Messiah.

No wonder the heart of the infamous Herod quaked with fear at the question of the magi. But his cunning thought itself equal to the emergency. He would discover this child, and promptly have him murdered. Calling together the Jewish council, the king asked them where the Christ was to be born. They gave ready answer, "In Bethlehem of Judea, for thus it is written by the prophet." Micah, centuries before, had foretold the glory that should visit the little and humble town, whose obscurity under the shadow of Jerusalem, "the City of the Great King," could not always hide its renown, as the birthplace of Israel's noblest king and the place of the advent of the nation's deliverer. Sending away the wise men the king bade them return with tidings of the child's exact whereabouts, that he might go himself to worship him. But the providence that had led them thus far would not suffer them to be the innocent instruments of such vile conspiracy, and a warning came to them which caused them to hurry quickly back to their own country, without returning to Jerusalem.

With what feelings must these good men have hastened on their journey toward Bethlehem At last their hopes were to be realized and they were to look upon the face of him who brought hope to a despairing race. No sooner had they passed out of the city than they saw above them the same star which had fastened their attention in their distant home. They recognized it as an added assurance of the divine guidance, and their hearts overflowed with holy joy. The star seemed to move as they advanced, until, as they approached Bethlehem it became motionless, and stood directly above the city. It was not long till they had found the child, for, even if the star did not, as some suppose, stand directly above the very house in which the holy family were lodging, there was doubtless enough knowledge of the birth of Jesus and his present whereabouts to be secured in almost any quarter of the city.

Joseph had long before this found more comfortable lodging for his family than the stable where Jesus was born. The crowds were no longer thronging the streets, now that the season of enrolling had passed. So we may believe them domiciled in one of the humble, but comfortable homes in the city of David. Into its doors now entered this group of strange men, whose dress and speech, as well as features, would attract attention wherever they went. Perhaps a curious throng followed them to Joseph's house and stood about the door, to see what might be the business of these travelers with this family so recently come to abide with them. To the wonder of the crowd, and no less of Joseph and Mary, no sooner were the strangers admitted than they fell on their faces before the gentle babe and hailed him as king of the Jews. They breathed out the most reverent words in which men were wont to worship God. Then, undoing their bundles, they laid at his feet such presents as subjects were accustomed to give to their rulers, gold and frankincense and myrrh. With holy joy they knew their quest to be ended and that they had knelt before the promised king.

At this Christmas season we may share in their joy as we share in their gifts. For, though the Babe of Bethlehem lingers in no earthly home to receive our homage in his own person, he is truly here in ten thousand homes where want a d sorrow await relief. And, whether with the gold that buys bread, or the frankincense that cheers the heart, or the myrrh that comforts in grief, we may lay our tributes at his feet and crown him Lord of all.

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 23.

THE GLORY OF CHRIST.

(John 1:1-14)

Regarding the pre-netal glory of Christ none of us is able to speak. The only word that comes to us is the word of ancient men. "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God." Here is a theological mystery that we might just as well leave off trying to comprehend.

But regarding the glory of Christ in the world of to-day, we can speak and speak with certitude. He is glorious beyond all rivalry in the position he occupies in our world. No personality is so commanding; no one shadow falls upon the world as his. He doth bestride the narrow world like a colossus. His influence falls upon every person and every institution of our little life of to-day. There is no life that has been lived in the centuries of history that has gone on living as his has done. And what are the sources of his glory?

1. The Spirit of God was upon him. Whenever one gathers into himself the nature of God in any degree, just in that degree does his character become glorious. God made us to attain his image. Jesus, more than any, has summed up in his life and character the divine Spirit of God. He is the chiefest among ten thousand, the one altogether lovely.

2. He sought not his own glory. The life that seeks its own glory is destined, is it not, to failure more or less dismal? But here is a life that sought not its own glory, but sought to aid and comfort men, and to advance the reign of God in the world. Its very self-forgetfulness, its very humility is its glory.

3. His was a life of courage, and courage is forever glorious. We are hero-worshipers all. We love the man who can dare. Jesus is never more glorious in our eyes than when he stands before Pilate, pale but determined, dignified beyond any dignity the world has known beside, and says, "I am a king," when he knew that he would die for saying it.

4. His was a life of kindness. To be sure, one may be kind without becoming glorious. There are many obscure lives that never become prominent, and that have no wreath of glory. But where a life is so conspicuously gentle as his, so kind as to lead to a death for the world's sake, glory is sure to come. Jesus himself said so when he declared: "The meek shall inherit the earth." That is, the gentle, kind folks shall gain dominion. It is so in the course of nature. In the struggle for existence, the feroclous wild brutes are disappearing, and the gentle-cattle, lambs, horses -are multiplying. It is so in commerce; the gentle, obliging people are the winners in the competition. It is so in all realms. The kind shall be glorious.

So one might go on enumerating the qualities of Jesus that have given him a name that is above every name, that, at the name of Jesus, every knee should bow-of things in heaven, things in earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that he is Lord, to the glory of God

"All hail the power of Jesus' name, Let angels prostrate fall; Bring forth the royal diadem, And crown him Lord of all." Buffalo, N. Y.

Literature,

NEW BOOKS.

OLD TOURAINE; the Life and History of the Famous Chateaux of France. By Theodore Andre Cook. James Pott & Co., New York. Two vols. $5.

In the valley of the River Loire, 150 miles southwest of Paris, is the district which in the old days constituted the province of Touraine. The center of the district is the ancient city of Tours, near which Charles Martel fought his famous battle in the middle of the eighth century and prevented a Saracen invasion of central Europe. A few miles up the stream is Amboise, a town famous in the history of the French Reformation, and still further up is Blois, the town from which came King Stephen of England. The whole region is dotted with points of historical interest and studded with chateaux whose history constitutes a large part of the history of France. While the story of many of these noble houses and their famous occupants runs through centuries, there was in the history of each one a supreme moment in which it was for the time the most important spot in the kingdom. Arranging these supreme moments in their chronological order and following this order in telling the story of the chateaux, the author gives us something which might be called either history topographically arranged, or description arranged chronologically. Whatever one calls it, it is something very delightful, pleasant to read and full of information. The land is full of romance. In the history of France, more than all other countries, women have from time to time played an important part and here in Touraine they have been especially conspicuous. From Fredegonde and Brunhilda of Merovingian times to Joan of Arc, Agnes Sorel Louise of Savoy, Margaret of Navarre, Diana of Poitiers, Katherine de Medici, Maria Stuart and Madame de Maintenon, they have all acted their parts in old Touraine and left the memory of their greatness in her chateaux. The volumes are sumptuous in their make-up and are illustrated with many photogravures.

The eight stories in this collection are of a single type. In each of them the youngster who figures as the central character has a dream so vivid and so nicely adjusted to the weaknesses of his disposition that the waking leaves him a wiser and a better boy. The boy who was selfish with his Christmas sled dreams of an endless and solitary coast over an unlimited expanse of snow, in the course of which he grew old pining for the society of his little brother and sister. The small boy whose youth was rendered dreary by an excess of maternal care, administered by five older sisters, had a dream which awoke in him a realization that even this situation was not without its compensating advantages. The little darkey who had a weakness for forbidden chickens received an effective warning in a dream which, from his point of view, might be classed as a first-rate nightmare. And so on. There is a good deal of ingenuity displayed in devising variations upon this single theme, the dream is corrective for the foibles of youth. The best story of the lot is "De Parson's Chickens."

THE DECEMBER MAGAZINES.

The principal articles in the Chautauquan are the series of Critical Studies in French Literature, the "Reading Journey in the Orlent," which is a sort of personally conducted tour through Egypt with good descriptions and copious bibliography, and the series of articles on the Rivalry of Nations, a study in the world politics of to-day.

The colored reproductions of pictures by Puvia de Chavannes in the Christmas Scribner's are fully up to the highest expectation. The soft coloring and the delicate lights which so conspicuously mark the works of this artist are admirably preserved and the accompanying essay by John La Farge is, of course, illuminating. There is in the same number a bear story of the Yellowstone Park, by Ernest Seton Thompson, the man who is chummy with grizzlies, and a story of an Arctic sledge-dog, by Henry Van Dyke.

The series of pictures which have been appearing in The Ladies' Home Journal for some months under the title "Through Picturesque America," are an excellent lesson to impress the fact that we have some scenery in this country which, considered simply as scenery, is as well worth traveling to and looking at as any to be found in any land. The photographs this month illustrate the scenic beauties of the Yosemite Valley. As is expected, the present number of this magazine contains many suggestions for Christmas.

The World's Work, the new magazine which began its publication (by Doubleday, Page & Co., New York,) with the November number, is making a fair start toward occupying a place in the list of the serious magszines. The twenty five page editorial survey of the happenings of the month, under the title "The March of Events," shows ability and a reasonably non-partisan spirit. The long articles are for the most part of a journalistic sort, i. e, relating to the events and conditions of to-day. The illustrations are numerous and good and there are a few pages of book reviews.

The Christmas Century opens with a gorgeously decorated reprint of Milton's Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity. The six full page pictures which accompany the poem are the richest examples of colored printing that have been given to us by any of the magazines. The first of a series of articles by Augustine Birrell on "Down the Rhine," illustrated with many drawings by Andre' Castaigne, is full (but not too full) of genial philosophy and literary allusion. Sir Walter Besant moves in a field with which he is thoroughly familiar when he writes of "East London Types."

There are many notable articles in the North American Review for this month. W. J. Bryan tells what he thinks about the recent election. There is a hitherto unpublished paper Government by the novellst Balzac. A son of the revolutionary leader Garibaldi writes on "Monarchy and Republic in Italy." Mr. Holland, the inventor of the submarine boat which bears his name, treats the general subject of submarine naviga tion, and Elizabeth Cady Stanton tells of the "Progress of the American Woman." The publishers announce that Mr. Howells will write a series of articles for the Review on phases of contemporary literature, the first of which on "The New Historical Romances," appears in this number. In brief, Mr. Howells does not like the new historical romances. He thinks that they contain much of the ludicrous and the grotesque, often of the immoral in a certain sense, yet he says that they do not exhibit those qualities which call for too serious denunciation. Most readers will agree with him that the characters in the average historical romance exhibit as little vitality and human personality as would the figures of the Eden Musee, if these were called upon to move and speak. As shining exceptions from this general condemnation, Mr. Howells cites two "retrospective novels" which he considers "as veracious as the faithfullest circumspective novels." These are Tolstoy's "War and Peace" and Mark Twain's These are "Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court."

The feature of the Outlook's magazine number for this month, which is also the annual Book Number, is a symposium of opinions by ten eminent men in answer to a request to name the ten books of this century which have most influenced its thought and activities. The opinions of such men as James Bryce, Henry Van Dyke, Arthur T. Hadley, Edward Everett Hale and A. M. Fairbairn on this question are worth hearing. It is noticeable that many of the writers name books which are now little known and less read, books which have exercised their influence indirectly, by influencing the writers of more popular books. How many of the readers of this paragraph, for example, have read Champollion's De l'ecriture hieratique des anciens Egyptiens or Niebuhr's Roemische Geschichte, which Dr. Fairbalrn mentions as the most important historical works of the century? In fact it is generally true that the great books are no: the ones that are the most read. And the most influential books are not necessarily greatest, for, as Dr. Fairbairn himself says, a book may be influential in the highest degree by teing merely timely.

Several features raise the Atlantic Monthly for this month even above its usual level. One of them is the article by Gerald Stanley Lee on "The Dominance of the Crowd," wherein he shows that, as Ruskin (I believe) has said, the besetting sin and essential characteristic of this age is an exaggerated faith in machinery, a faith in the efficacy of organization to take the place of personality. Here are a few of Mr. Lee's epigrammatic sentences: "Every idea we have is run into a constitution. We cannot think without a chairman. Our whims have secreta ies; our fads have bylaws. I iterature is a club. Philosophy is a society. Our reforms are mass meetings. Our culture is a summer school. We cannot mourn our mighty dead without Carnegie Hall and forty vicepresidents. We remember our poets with tru-tees and the immortality of a genius is watched by a standing committee. Charity is an association. Theology is a set of resolutions. Religion is an endeavor to be numerous and communicative. And how Jesus of Nazareth could have done so great a work without being on a committee is beyond our ken" These are good epigrams and no writer of the present time has a better command of that fascinating but dangerous style than Gerald Stanley Lee.

Did Not Cure.

BUT GREATLY HELPED BY CHANGE OF FOOD.

A lady in Harrisburg, O., is frank enough to say that, while she has been helped, she was not entirely cured in the change of food and taking up Grape-Nuts food. She says she began eating rich and highly seasoned food when she was young and followed it until she set up a bad stomach trouble, with severe attacks of nervous sick headache.

Finally rheumatism of the joints set in, and now some of her joints are dislocated by the heavy deposits forming about them and pushing them out of place, so that she is almost helpless. Her nervous system was wrecked and the optic nerve affected so that she could not read without bringing on nervous prostration and insomnia that would last two or three nights.

"Last fall I heard of, and commenced the use of Grape-Nuts as a food. It has since been both food and medicine to me, for I have taken very little medicine since I began to use it. After 10 months I find a great improvement in my brain and nerve power, am no longer troubled with sleeplessness, I suffer very much less with my rheumatism, and can read several hours a day, one day after the other, and sleep well all night.

"I am by no means entirely cured of rheumatism, but I have been made so much better by the use of Grape-Nuts food that I am sincerely thankful for it." This name will be furnished by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Francis Davis was born near Alexandria, Va, Francis Davis was born near Alexandria, Va, December 18, 1812, and came to St. Louis in 1834. He came to Hannibel in 1841, and lived in or near the city until his death. Mr. Davis was married the second time in this city in 1844, to Miss Josephine Pavey, and from this union there were born three children, William A., Ella S., and Henry F., Missouri's most efficient Sunday school secretary. Mrs. Davis died July 4th, 1854, when the youngest child was only three years of age. After the marriage of his daughter to Mr. J. O Farmer, Mr. Davis made his home with them until her death. Mr. Davis made his home with them until her death, April 26, 1884, after which sad event he made his home with his son, William, living in Ralls County, five miles from Hannibal. Mr. Davis was reared in the primitive Baptist faith, and hence his long years of a xious waiting for that remarkable change which never came. But in later life, becoming intimate with L. B. Wilkes, W. H. Hopson, Jacob Creath, Dr. Morton and like spirits, he learn-Jacob Creath, Dr. Morton and like spirits, he learned the way better, a d in November, 1893, gave him elf to Christ, and unit d with the O can Wave Christian Church. He was baptized by W. M. Roe. After more than eight months' constant suffering, he passed away Nov. 24, 1900, and was buried in beautiful Mt. Olivet cemetery to await the resurrection of the just. Bro. Davis was a man of strict integrity of character. Those who knew him best esteemed him most. His frank, honest heart held friends when once attracted him. The community in which he lived for so many him. The community in which he lived for so many years has been blessed by his influence. He has left the stamp of his truth loving soul upon his chi'dren. His name was a synonym for kind treatment and fair dealing. The funeral service was conducted by the writer at the request of the famconducted by the water fly, and we bade him goodbye.

BARCLAY MEADOR, ADVERTISING MANAGER.

For several weeks there has appeared in our columns an advertisement of a Purchasing Agency. The agency purchases all kinds of goods to be found in New York City, for those who are not able to visit the city and know no one upon whom they could rely to do this service for them. Mr. W. E. Scott, who organized the agency, formerly lived in St. Louis. He is personally known to the writer and is not only an honorable gentleman, but is conservative and careful and in every sense trustworthy.

There is a firm "way down East" which keeps the Webster Dictionary from going out of print. They do this not by printing the pages over again as they were when Noah Webster put the finishing touches to the book. They revise it every ten years and put out what in a sense is a new book. This firm, G. & C. Merriam, of Springfield, Mass., cannot add 25,000 new words and make new plates and from them print new pages for a new dictionary and remain silent upon the subject. On the contrary they call to their aid almost every leading publication in the country to scatter broad cast the fact that a new edition of Webster's International Dictionary has been issued and is on the market. If they did not do this we people out West would go on using the old dictionary. Their latest edition, recently off the press, has already received very high commendation, being characterized as "thoroughly reliable and full of just such informatian as one wishes to secure."

Seven million copies of the Bible are issued annually. This means that a great many printing presses are printing the sacred pages. Thos. Nelson & Sons, of New York, make a specialty of teachers' Bibles. They make use of the columns of religious papers to make this fact known. The fact is they produce a Bible which, with the texts and helps, is a whole library of sacred knowledge. Their helps are prepared by writers who are among the most celebrated Bible students, schol ars, Egyptologists and divines of America and Great Britain. They print from new plates and use the thionest printing paper in the world They have succeeded in making teachers' Bibles that are favorites, and ought to make the fact known to all teachers. They use our columns.

The Benevolent Association.

The Benevolent Association wisnes to express thanks to the many friends who sent Thanksgiving offerings in money, food and clothing to the Orphans' Home. During the summer, when contributions were light, our unpaid bills mounted up to more than $500, which we have been unable to pay up to the present time. Remembering that we have an average of 130 children in our 'hildren's Homes, while we are also maintaining a small home and preparing a large one for old people, it is not surprising that our expenses are nearly $800 a month.

It wonder if there are not one hundred persons who are able and willing to send to the corresponding secretary $5 each as a Christmas gift for this work in honor of the birth of the Christ child—our Savior? I would be glad to publish a long list of Christ's birth ay gifts in the January issue of the Orphan's Cry, and will take advantage of being on the ground to head that list with the first $5 gift.

We wish to remind our friends that the Benevolent Association has adopted the same annuity plan which is proving so successful with the missionary so-ieties, and that we pay the same rate of interest. To help in the work of providing a Home for our old people, Sister Nancy Henderson of Jacksonville, Ill., has given us a house and lot which have already been converted into $2,250, which will go into the purchase or building of a permanent Home. She holds the annuity bond of this association for the same. We hope that many others will follow her example, and help us to extend and carry on this work for little children and the homeless old people of the church.

FROM IN MEMORIAM.

ALFRED TENNYSON.

The time draws near the birth of Christ; The moon is bid; the night is still; The Christmas bells from hill to hill Answer each other in the mist.

Four voices of four hamlets round,
From far and near, on mead and moor,
S well out and fail, as if a door
Were shut between me and the sound.

Each voice four changes on the wind,
That now di ate and now decrease,
Peace and good will, good will and peace,
Peace and good will to all mankind.

But they my troubled spirits rule,

For they controlled me when a boy,

They bring me sorrow touched with joy,

The merry, merry bells of Yule.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

"What means this glory round our feet,"
The Magi mused, "more bright than morn?"
And voices chanted clear and sweet,
"To-day the Prince of Peace is born!"

'What means that star," the shepherds said,
"That brightens through the rocky glen?"
And angels answering overhead,
Sang, "Peace on earth, good will to men!"

'Tis eighteen hundred years and more Since those sweet oracles were dumb; We wait for Him, like them of yore; Alas, He seems so slow to come!

But it was said, in words of gold

No time or sorrow e'er shall dim,

That little children might be bold

In perfect trust to come to him.

All round about our feet shall shine
A light like that the wise men saw,
If we our loving wills incline
To that sweet Life which is the Law.

So shall we learn to understand

The simple faith of shepherds then,
And clasping kindly hand in hand,
Sing, "Peace on earth, good will to men!"

And they who do their souls no wrong, But keep at eve the faith of morn, Shall daily hear the angel-song "To-day the Prince of Peace is born!"

KING OLAF'S CHRISTMAS.

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

At Drontheim, Olaf the King
Heard the bells of yule tide ring,
As he sat in his banquet-hall,
Drinking the nut-brown ale,
With his bearded Berserks hale
And tall.

O'er his drinking-horn, the sign
He made of the cross divine,
As he drank and muttered his prayers;
But the Berserks evermore
Made the Sign of the Hammer of Thor
Over theirs.

"Sing me a song divine
With a sword in every line,
And this be thy reward."
And he loosened the belt at his waist
And in front of the singer placed His Sword.

Then the Scald took his harp and sang,
And loud through the music rang
The Sound of that Shining word;
And the harp-strings a clangor made.
As if they were struck by the blade
Of a sword.

And the Berserks round about
Broke forth into a shout
That made the rafters ring:
They smote with their fists on the board
And shouted, "Long live the Sword
And the King."

Then King Olaf raised the hilt Of iron, cross-shaped and gilt, And said, "Do not refuse; Count well the gain and the loss, Thor's hammer or Christ's cross: Choose!"

And Halfred the Scald said, "This
In the name of the Lord I kiss,
Who on it was crucified!"
And a shout went round the board,
"In the name of Christ the Lord,
Who died!"

Then over the waste of snows

The noonday sun uprose,

Through the driving mists revealed,

Like the lifting of the Host,

By incense-clouds almost Concealed.

On the shining wall a vast
And shadowy cross was cast
From the hilt of the lifted sword,
And in foaming cups of ale
The Berserks drank "Was-hael!
To the Lord!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate, called upon to ratify the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in regard to the building of the Nicaragua Canal, has taken the somewhat unusual course of adopting an amendment which materially alters the import of the treaty. It will be remembered that the treaty provides that the canal shallbe kept strictly neutral in time of either war or peace. On the other hand, the canal bill as passed by the House instructs the Secretary of War to "build and fertify." Evidently the treaty and the bill could not stand together. One must be modified or rejected. The Davis amendment, which the Senate adopted by a vote of 65 to 17, is a compromise measure. Accepting all the treaty's safe-guards for neutrality, it provides that these stipulations "shall not apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing, by its own forces, the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order." This means that in case of a war involving the United States the canal would not necessarily be neutral. It is interpreted as a set-back to Anglo-American cordiality. British Ambassador Pauncefote believes that his government will not accept the amended treaty and it has been reported without adequate confirmation that Secretary Hay's resignation is virtually in the President's hands.

Two conditions must be fulfilled by any measure which has to provide satisfactorily for the construction and maintenance of an isthmian canal. One is that we shall deal honorably with Great Britain, in so far as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty gives her a right to be considered in the matter at all, and that we shall not give just cause for the interruption of the cordial relations which ought ever to exist between the two governments; and the other is that, if we take the responsibility of constructing the canal, we must control it as absolutely as we control Mas:achusetts Bay or the coast of New Jersey. The commercial and political importance of that interoceanic waterway is too great for us to allow it to become an object of international haggling in any emergency. There is no harbor in the United States the neutrality of which, in time of war, we might not better concede than that of this canal. Let the task of diplomacy be to reconcile these two indispensable conditions, to show to Great Britain that Anglo Saxon control of the canal is more to her advantage than neutrality would be. This, perhaps, will not be an easy task and with the development of these diplomatic complications there is a growing probability that the passage of the canal bill by the Senate will be subjected to considerable delay, possibly even beyond the present short session of Congress. The Panama interests, in spite of the report of the commission in favor of the Nicaragua route, are sedulously nursing every pretext for delay and all the elements of opposition to the canal will unite to make these diplomatic preliminaries as difficult and time-consuming as possible.

On Wednesday of last week was celebrated in our national capital the centennial of the first assembling of Congress in Washington City. It was on November 17, 1800, that the Sixth Congress met for the first time in the new capitol building, the corner stone of which had been laid seven years before by Washington with Masonic ceremonies and the accompaniment of a barbecue feast. In this hundred years the city has grown from a population of 3,000 to 288,000 and has been transformed from a muddy village into one of the handsomest capitals in the world. The German capital (a parvenu among the historic cities of Europe) is four centuries old and the Austrian seven, while the French and British capitals, dating as settlements almost from the beginning of the Christian era, have been centers of civilization for a dozen centuries. And yet, as Senator Hoar pointed out in his speech in the congressional celebration, Washington compares not unfavorably with any of them for magnificent streets and public buildings. The capitol building, which was almost entirely destroyed by fire when the British captured the city in 1814 and which has been either reconstructed or enlarged in every generation of its history, has cost altogether about $19,000,000. There are many more costly seats of national government but none more imposing or architecturally perfect. Our capital seems now to be far to one edge of the republic, but it must be remembered that at the time when Washington was chosen as the seat of government it was west of the center of population. Even now the representatives of the most distant states can make the journey to the capital with less time and inconvenience than those from New York or Pailadelphia could then.

The week in South Africa has been marked by Boar successes on a larger scale than any since the early stage of the war. De Wets force, which was apparently so neatly cornered between impassable rivers and overwhelming columns of the enemy, seems to have leaked through the trap in some inscrutable fashion and to be leading General Knox a break-neck race which is most appropriately characterized as a fox-chase. Meanwhile Commander Delarey, at the head of a body of nearly three thousand Boers, has attacked General Clements forty miles west of Pretoria and has gained a signal victory, capturing several British companies. This is said to be the first time in the whole war that the Boers have taken the initiative in an attack. There is a grewsome significance in the fact that this engagement took place upon the anniversary of the disastrous battle of Colenso. Mr. Broderick, in a gloomy speech in the House of Commons, has declared that the expenditures must continue at least four months longer at the same rate which has prevailed during the past year. A supplementary grant of £16,000 000 has been voted without opposition, the Liberals being patriotically willing to see the thing through at any cost, though they are not slow to accuse the government, as Sir William Vernon Harcourt and Lord Rosebery have done, of gross miscalculation at every stage of the war. It is needless to remark that the laurels of the returning British generals are losing much of their luster by reason of the Boer successes. General Roberts has sailed for home.

Archbishop Ireland and Bishop McGoldrick appeared before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs last week to present arguments against the adoption of the anti-canteen amendment which has been passed by the House. The argument of these distinguished ecclesiastics was the same old threadbare argument which has been used from the beginning of time: that it ought to be made easy for men to do a small wrong so that they will not take the trouble to do the larger wrong which lies just out of easy reach. It ought to be made easy for the recruit to get comparatively mild alcoholic beverages and to get moderately drunk on them if he wants to at the canteen, so that he will not be so strongly tempted to go outside and get roaring drunk on the bad whiskey which is furnished unofficially. are several fallacies in this argument. One is that drinking a little bit does not ordinarily decrease or satisfy the desire; and the man who would, as the opponents of the amendment say, go outside to get his drink if it were not furnished in the canteen, will still go outside if he cannot get it in the canteen as much or as strong as he wants. Archbishop Ireland makes light of the objection that many young men who had been previously temperate learned intemperate habits in the canteen. He says that "the young man who has never drunk before entering the army is a rare article." Evidently the Archbishop has a poor opinion of the young men of this country.

St. Louis is enjoying the prospect of a non-partisan campaign for municipal decency. A meeting of representative business men has been held at the call of the Newspaper Publishers' Association to discuss plans for civic house-cleaning in view of the World's Fair which is to be held here in 1903. St. Louis has suffered so much from the machinations of political ringsters of both parties, who interpret public office as a private snap, and its citizens have been so often deluded with the pretense of non-partisan reform only to discover that the movement was really in the interest of one rotten gang against another, that it is a distinct relief to hear of the appointment of a standing committee of reputable citizens whose integrity and intelligence is above question. The city has many needs. It is hampered by the limitations placed by the charter on the local government, and by the untrustworthiness of the local government in handling the power which it has. It needs a new charter with fewer village limitations and it needs a city council capable of wielding this larger power. It needs to be swept and scrubbed and drained. If the prospect of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition shall be the occasion for such an access of municipal pride and honesty and cleanliness as shall give the city clean streets and clean government, it will be worth all the millions which it is to cost. A world's fair is a doubtful blessing to any city. Like some other stimulants it causes great hilarity and the appearance of abound ing life for a time, but is apt to be followed by a relapse. There is, however, much good to be gained by the expectation of it. As the old proverb says that there is more pleasure in anticipation than in realization, so there is doubtless more advantage to be gained by a city in preparing for a world's fair than in having it.

It has been decided that the envoys in Pekin shall go ahead with their negotiations without waiting for the Chinese representatives to present their credentials. There is still opportunity for indefinite delays, for international diplomatic mach nery never moves rapidly at best and the Chinese are particularly prolific of pretexts for procrastination. There will still be a chance for China to haggle over the acceptance of the terms which the envoys have laid down in their preliminary agreement, though it has been generally agreed upon that the acceptance of these terms by China shall be declared to be irrevocable and indispensable. It is reported that General Chaffee and Count Von Waldersee, the German Commander-in-Chief, have made up their difficulty, which grew out of the former's disapproval of the complaisant attitude of the latter toward the looting by German soldiers.

An ingenious divorce mill which has been in operation for a considerable time in New York City has been discovered and checked and its operator given a penitentiary sentence. The promoter of this scheme used a system at once simple and daring. Women were employed to play the part of co-respondents in divorce suits which were placed in his hands and, by making under oath on the witness stand the false confessions which he dictated to them, the case was readily gained. The operator of this method was convicted of subornation of perjury and was given a severe sentence. Investigation would probably lead to the discovery of similar schemes systematically operated in other places.

William E. Curtis is authority for the statement that "the post-office department has decided upon six special stamps for the benefit of the Pan-American Exposition The 1-cent stamp of green at Buffalo. color will have a picture of a lake steamer to represent the great transportation industry of the inland seas in which Buffalo is so much interested. The 2 cent stamp, printed in red, will have a railway train; the 4-cent stamp, in redbrown, an automobile; the 5 cent stamp, in blue, a picture of the new bridge at Niagara Falls; the 8-cent stamp, in lilac, a picture of the lock at Sault Ste. Marie, and the 10-cent stamp, of light brown, an ocean steamer."

BACK TO BETHLEHEM.

Once a year at least the great capitals of the world are eclipsed by the splendor which shines from the little town of Bethlehem of Judea. All over the world at this season of the year men are saying with the shepherds of old, "Let us now go even unto Bethlehem and see this thing that is come to pass, which the Lord made known to us." This year, more than ever before since the birth of the Christian era, will the world go to Bethlehem to study with new interest what manner of child was born there nineteen centuries ago, and what influences have gone forth from His life to bless the race and to change the current of the world's life and the course of human history.

There are several reasons why there should be greater interest now than ever before in the birth of Jesus who is called Christ. In the first place the world has a better opportunity now at the close of nineteen centuries of Christian history than ever before to judge of the character and scope of the life and teaching of Jesus and of their ultimate effect on the world. In the beginning of the Christian era men had no data by which to determine what the influence of Jesus' life and doctrine, His death and His resurrection, would be upon the world, except the general principle that whatever is true and right must exert a beneficent influence upon mankind. But in the light of these past nineteen centuries of history, the case is very different. We now know by actual experience and observation what have been the effects of Christ's influence upon the civilization of the world. Each century has added its quota of testimony to the vitalizing and uplifting influence of Christ on every sphere of life in which He has been permitted to enter. The present century especially has been prolific in movements theological, sociological, philanthropic, educational, political and industrial, which may be said to be the outgrowth of Christ's teaching, and which have done much to lift the world out of darkness into the light of a better day. Those who cannot reason from cause to effect are often able to reason back from effect to cause, and will find the only adequate explanation for the world's advancing civilization in the birth of Jesus nineteen centuries ago.

The converging lines of testimony from so many departments of life and from so many fields of thought, all tending to show the reasonableness of the Christian faith and the necessity for the facts upon which it is based in order to account for the phenomena which confront us on every hand, are giving a new impetus to Christianity and naturally awakening a new interest in its historical sources. A marked tendency of the closing decades of the present century is the disposition to turn away from creed formulas and from doctrinal speculations to the personal, historic Christ as the source of all that is true and vital in the Christian faith. The Lives of Jesus written by Strauss and Renan, unsatisfactory as they were when considered as interpretations of His real pature, did much for Christianity by calling attention to and awaking an interest in the personal Christ, as is manifest by the large number of books which have been written since, dealing with the same problem and in a far more evangelical and helpful way. This tendency has found expression, in these later years, in the cry, "Back to Christ," a cry which, in spite of any abuses to which it may be subject, is bound to prevail, because it holds within it the essential principle of all true reform in religion. The farther the church has gotten away from Christ, the less has it been able to cope with the powers of darkness and to minister to the world's needs. Nothing is more imperative, at the present time, than that the church should get back to Christ and enthrone Him as the source of all its authority, its life and its truth. The waning power of creeds and the rising power of the personal Christ are facts which are full of significance as to the future of Christianity.

On this last Christmas-tide of the nineteenth century let us join in the great procession which is on its way to Bethlehem. Let us hear once more that Gloria in Excelsis sung by the angel choir in honor of the birth of Jesus. Let us feel, as did the shepherds of old, who watched their flocks by night, the presence of the supernatural in the very palpitating air, vocal with the sweet refrain, "Peace on earth, good will toward men." Let us seek to enter into the joy which the angels felt on that starry night, but which mortals then could not comprehend. Let us go with our gifts of frankincense and myrrh-the sincerest tributes of gratitude and praise-and offer them at the shrine of Him "who, being in the form of God, counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yes, the death of the cross." This is the world's great love-story. In it Prophecy and History meet while Justice and Mercy are reconciled.

In a literal or geographical sense we cannot all go to Bethlehem, and even if we could, it might not profit us much. But in another and higher sense we may all go to Bethlehem. We may even make our hearts a Bethlehem wherein Christ shall be born anew and at whose shrine we may offer the sincerest tribute of love and adoration. So shall the world be made gladder and brighter and better by this anniversary of the birth of Christ.

hour of Prayer.

NINETEEN CENTURIES OF BLESSINGS THROUGH CHRIST.

(Luke 2:8-20; Acts 19:20.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic Dec. 26.]

CENTRAL TRUTH:—The coming of Christ was the opening up of a new era of blessing and of hope for mankind, and nineteen centuries of history confirm the truth of the angelic testimony, that His birth in the world was "good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people."

This is the last regular prayer meeting for the year. It is the last meeting of the kind of the century. In a few days the year will have closed, the nineteenth century will have gone into history, and a new century will be born. Surely, it is a time, not only "for memory and for tears," but for high resolves. What is it that has marked off these nineteen centuries from all the centuries which have gone before them? It was the birth of Christ. This great event drew a distinct line across the ages and introduced a new era in the history of time. What have been some of the blessings which Christ's coming has conferred upon the world?

- 1. It has introduced the element of hope into the world. We know how dark despair was settling down upon the hearts of humanity before the coming of Christ. Men had tried the ways of sin and found them unsatisfying. Pagan religions had been weighed in the balances and found wanting. Like the Venus of Milo they had no hands with which to minister to the world's deepest needs. Men were "without God and without hope in the world." Neither Hebrew law, Roman government nor Greek culture had proven a panacea for the world's ills. Each generation saw humanity sinking to lower levels of sin and sensuality. But the coming of Christ introduced a new element of hope into the life of mankind, because it opened up a channel of divine grace and love, and brought earth into closer contact with heaven. In Christ men saw a new type of humanity, a new ideal of life, and in His teachings and works they saw a new revelation of God. They saw that God loved men, and that he was the Father of men, and that He had sent His Son into the world, not to condemn it, but to save it. And so the star of hope rose, with its cheering light, above the horizon of time, and shone upon the pathway of men.
 - 2. It has introduced a new element of power into the world. It was when the world was "without strength" that Christ visited it and "died for the ungodly." Christ's coming not only gave the world a new ideal of life, but new power to overcome the false ideals and to struggle upward to higher things. Those who believed in Christ received power to become the sons of God in the spiritual and ethical sense of the phrase. And those thus renewed in the spirit of their minds began to work for the world's betterment. Every rediemed life became a source of new strength for the lifting up of the world. What mighty deeds have been wrought through the power of faith in the Son of God! Neither cold, nor hunger, nor weariness, nor stripes, nor imprisonment, nor martyrdom itself sufficed to check the rising power of the new faith which had its origin in Jesus Christ. It is in this sublime faith, which gives to men the power of an endless life, that all the battles have been fought and all the victories won for truth and righteousness since time began; but this faith has received new meaning and new power with the coming of Christ, who has changed the whole course of human history.

- 3. Jesus Christ has broken the fetters of slavery, has sanctified childhood, has ennobled womanhood, has made more sacred the marriage relation, has exalted the family and the home and given dignity and value to human life. It has enlarged the area of human freedom and broken the power of kings and despots. It has established constitutions, safe-guarding the rights of the people and guaranteeing liberty and protection to the humblest citizens. It has built up in the New World a Republic based upon the will of the people, and granting civil and religious liberty to all who come under its protection.
- 4. It has begotten the spirit of human brotherhood which is born of the fatherhood of God, and it is binding the human race closer together. We are coming more and more to feel our common kinship and hence our obligation to care for the rights and the welfare of the unfortunate, the weak and those who are less able to care for themselves. Out of this feeling has come our hospitals, our asylums for different purposes, our homes for orphans, widows and the aged, our common schools, our prison reforms and all our philanthropic agencies for alleviating human sorrow and for lifting up the lowly out of their wretchedness and their need. The great missionary movements of the century have come also out of this feeling of responsibility for the welfare of others which we owe to Christ.

Indeed for all that sanctifies our homes, that sweetens and dignifies hu nan life, for all that enables us to see this mortal life in the light of the life eternal, for all that helps to lift the world out of darkness into light, out of despair into hope, out of the sensual into the spiritual, out of death into life, we are indebted to the coming of Jesus Christ into the world. Well, then may we sing:

"Joy to the world, the Lord is come! Let earth receive her King; Let every heart prepare Him room, And heav'n and nature sing."

PRAYER.

Our Father in heaven, with hearts full of gratitude do we thank Thee that Thou didst so love the world as to give Thine only begotten Son to visit us in our tine of dire need, and to bring us life and salvation. thank Thee for the coming of Christ and for all the manifold blessings which have come to the world from His life and teaching, and from His dea h for us and His resurrection from the dead. May we all, at this season of the year when our hearts are stirred by thoughts of the Christ child, resolve to receive Him more fully into our hearts, that our lives may be a greater blessing to mankind, and that we may leave the world better for having lived in it. As we recount the blessings which have come to the world through nine een centuries of Christian history, may our faith and our vision be enlarged so that we may henceforth labor more diligently and more effectively to make this world what Thou wouldst have it to be. For the sake of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen!

Come to think of it, Christmas will soon be here. Christmas! It is a word to conjure with. What other word can carry one back more swiftly across the gulf of years to the green shores of childhood? What other season of the year so softens the heart and calls out all the generous and tender emotions within us as Christmas-tide? Old "Scrooge" himself can hardly help feeling a little warming up of heart, as he looks about him and sees so many homes of want where little children and sad hearted mothers could be made happy and grateful by some kindly remembrance. Bless his poor, dwarfed soul, he does not know what real joy it would bring him to be the almoner of Christ to carry relief and a little breath of real Christmas to some of these desolate homes. Nor is "Scrooge" the only one who is a stranger to the happiness that comes from dividing our Christmas blessings with others less favored than ourselves. Most of us are too busy to stop to think of some poor family which we could he!p to have a merry Christmas. At least, we think we are, and so Christmas passes and we seldom give ourselves the genuine pleasure of trying to make others outside our own homes happy. Would not this be a good year to make amends if that has been our fault?

Few things are more pathetic, as Christmas approaches, than the efforts made in the homes of the poor by weary, toiling mothers to secure some little toys or articles of clothing for the expectant children. They have heard other children tell of Santa Claus, and have perhaps seen him in the shop windows surrounded by wagon loads of such things as delight the hearts of boys and girls. Why should he not come to their humble homes? In their simple faith they believe he will come and they wonder what he will bring them. The tired mother—a poor seamstress, it may be, who works for a mere pittance, ponders how she may provide something for them, so that they may not realize their poverty too keenly. Fortunately it takes very little to make poor children happy. They would be delighted with toys which have been laid aside by the children of the wealthy. If every reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST would make it a point o find out one such family and try to make Christmas a bright and happy day for its members, they would greatly enhance their own joy and vastly increase the sum total of human happiness. They would also give a religious meaning to Christmas which it is in danger of losing. Take the children along with you on these visits of mercy and let them share with you in experiencing the truth that "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

How can we make Christmas a more religious day and free it from those excesses which have become attached to it? Strange that a day associated with the birth of Christ should be so largely given over to utter frivolity and often to excess of eating and drinking. One reason for it, however, is that the churches have not attempted to give a religious turn to the joy and gladness of the day. Why should not Protestant churches hold religious services on Christmas and seek to impress the lessons of His life upon young and old? Is it because no one can prove that Jesus was born on December 25th? What difference does that make? He was born, and that is the fact that concerns us. Is it because Roman Catholics hold services on that day? They also hold religious services on the Lord's day, but we do not regard that as a reason why Protestants should not meet on that day for worship. No authority for it? No, not any more than for our mid-week meetings or Thanksgiving service. Nor do we need any more. We cannot abolish Christmas, if we would, and we would not if we could. Let us do what we can then to make it serve the cause of Him whose birth it commemorates. The joyful character of the day should be retained, but the joy should be purified, and express itself in forms of religious worship, in deeds of charity, and in those interchanges of remembrances among dear friends which custom has already established.

If God really entered into humanity, in the birth of Christ, if Christ were indeed "Immanuel"-God with us-if the motive lying behind that incarnation of Deity was infinite love, and its purpose was the salvation of a lost and sinning world, who can overestimate the meaning of that event? What may we not hope for if the Power which created and controls the universe is Love, and is guiding all things toward a far off, beneficent end? "If God be for us who can be against us?" If the Almighty has stooped down to us and shared our griefs and sorrows, and suffered for our sins, in the person of Jesus, that He might exalt us to our true dignity, who can successfully resist his gracious purposes? If what Christmas stands for is a fact of history then indeed there is a divine factor at work shaping the course of events, leavening the world with its saving influence and leading humanity on to a glorious destiny. Here is the basis which Faith offers for a true optimism—that God has undertaken man's case that He has entered into human history as a controlling and transforming power and that "they that be for us are more than they that be against us." If evil seems to be triumphant now let us know that its triu uph is only temporary, for in Christ God has united Himself with humanity for the overthrow of iniquity and the triumph of righterness in the world.

SHALL WE FAIL?

To endow a Bible college at Columbia, Mo., for the benefit of the students attending the State University, about $40,000 has been subscribed subject to the condition that $50,000 be raised by January 1, 1901. This leaves about $10,000 to be pledged before the end of the present year to make good the $40,-000 already subscribed. The donors to this endowment have the privilege of giving their notes and paying six per cent. interest on same until such time as they prefer to pay the notes off. This effort to endow Bible instruction at the seat of the State University has attracted wide attention and commendation in the state and out of it. Its wisdom, so far as it is an attempt to teach the English Bible to the students of the University, is universally conceded. Even $50,000 would insure the perpetuity of a Bible chair at Columbia, which would bring the literature of the Bible to the attention of the best educated young people of the state, and exert a wide influence in behalf of Christianity. Shall this enterprise fail for lack of the paltry sum of $10,-000 when there are scores of brethren in the state so able to give the entire amount? This would be a very discreditable retreat. We beseech the brethren of the state not to permit it. But the time is very short. What is done must be done quickly. Let those whom the Lord may stir up to help in this matter write at once to T. P. Haley, Kansas City, W. T. Moore, Columbia, or the editor of this paper.

Questions and Hnswers.

Is it the position of any of our leading ministers that, in conversion, faith changes the mind and repentance the heart?

H. Scott.

We cannot say what some preachers may have said or may not have said, but we should think the above was a very faulty attempt at analysis. It is faith in Christ, mingled with repentance, that works by love and purifies the heart. Faith and repentance are not distinct steps following each other, one beginning where the other ends, but they exist together and work together in the purification of the heart and mind, and in bringing the disobedient into subjection to the will of Christ.

In the Christian-Evangelist, Nov. 8th, in answer to a query you state: "The underlying principle of both of these days (the Seventh Day Sabbath and the Lord's day), is the consecration of one day out of seven to purely religious uses." Will you please cite a single passage in proof of this position? Clark Braden.

Jesus said: "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath." What is true of the Sabbath, in this respect, is no doubt true of the Lord's day. It, also, was made for man, and not man for it. The underlying principle in both days, then, is that they were designed to promote man's interests. Shall we say that the Sabbath was made for man's material interests alone, and with no reference to his religious nature? This would be a low conception of the meaning of the Fourth Commandment. It served man's higher nature as it could not have been served by se en days of labor. The Lord's day, too, has respect to man's physical nature as well as to his religious needs. Man is a unit and what is helpful to his body is also helpful to his mind and heart. The religious use of the day of rest we believe to be highest meaning of both the Sabbath and the Lord's day, though the latter does not rest on the Fourth Command-

- 1. What may be said to be the doctrines held in common between those whom you would regard as representative Baptists and representative Disciples of Christ?
- 2. Do these points of agreement furnish a sufficient basis for practical Christian union and co-operation?

 Apollos.
- 1. Baptists and Disciples alike hold to those fundamental truths which, by general consent, constitute what is known as evangelical Christianity, such as the inspiration and authority of the Holy Scriptures, the incarnation, the trinity or tri-personality of God, the depravity of mankind and the necessity of regeneration, justification by faith, and the necessity of maintaining good works and a pure life; also the doctrine of the future life with its rewards for the righteous and its retribution for the wicked. In addition to these general truths held in common by the great body of evangelical Christians, there are some points held in common by Baptists and Disciples which are not accepted by the majority of the religious world. Among these may be mentioned the sufficiency of the New Testament as a rule of faith and practice, which most Baptists accept, the doctrine that only peni ent be-lievers are proper subjects for baptism, and that baptism is an immersion into, and an emersion out of, water—a symbolic burial wi h Christ, a resurrection with Him unto No doubt there are many newness of life. other points on which they agree which are less important in their bearing on Christian fellowship.

2. Given the spirit of unity, there is no reason why the two bodies should not cooperate as Christian brethren, with that liberty for freedom of opinion in which both bodies profess to believe. There exist, however, some mu ual prejudices and misunderstandings which will probably suffice, for some time to come, to keep the two peoples apart, but these misunderstandings cannot continue, and the time will come when they will recognize their essential unity in Christ, and treat each other as brethren.

CHRISTMAS IN THE CZAR'S LAND.

BY MADAME FRIEDLAND.

How differently the Christmas Holidays are celebrated in Russia from any other country. England and the United States have but one day for Christmas and one for New Year. Turoughout the Empire of the Czar—be it capital or village—the Christmas holidays comprise two entire weeks. Beginning from December 24th until January 6th, when schools and factories once more resume their work, we have one line of holidays.

Most of our factory men come from villages more or less remote, where their families live, and they go home for Christmas, but they are in no hurry to take up work again. I have often heard the managers of factories complain that regular work is stopped for a whole month.

The Russian peasant has not yet reached that step of civilization where money is everything. He can still enjoy the day without troubling about the morrow. A week before Christmas the streets of our cities offer a tempting picture for the artist's brush and are apt to bring tears of admiration into the foreign tourist's eye.

The clear blue sky of our northern win'er and the bright sun look down on a motley crowd of different races—Russians, Tartars, Armenians, Circassians and many more, all dressed in their national costumes, bright with the colors of the rainbow—some anxious to sell, others to buy, the whole scene heightened by peep-shows, booths, vendors of drinks, idlers, merry-makers of all kinds, whose fur coats and caps, sheepskins and snow-boots match well with the snow and ice.

The Gostinoi Dvor, the great Bazar of St. Petersburg, looks as if an entire forest of firs had left its home and had come to the great capital to be made into Christmas trees, for there is nobody so poor but that he can afford a small tree, decorated with paper flowers, multicolored glass beads and cheap dainties.

Fortunes are spent every year on Christmas trees in the houses of the wealthy and on presents for relatives, friends and servants. Every club, society, school and regiment has a Christmas tree for those who for some geason are unable to have one at home. The Christmas tree is lighted every evening between the 24th of December and the 6th of January, and is always followed, at home or in a public place, by a dance.

My memory goes back to many a Christmas tree since the time I was a little tot and had to be lifted up by loving hands in order to reach my Christmas presents, hung quite low on the tree. It follows me to a Christmas tree given by the Dowager Empress to the pupils of St. Katherine's Institute, of which she is the patroness, when the boys educated at the imperial military schools, corps de pages and other institutions are invited to the ball which generally takes place after the tree is removed. But no Christmas tree did I enjoy more than the one decorated and lighted right in the forest where it grew in one of our distant country-seats, far away from the bustle and life of a city. What a lovely picture the tall, slender fir made with its outstretched arms, covered with millions of snow-flakes glistening with the electric lights, brightening the winter night with their beauty! And the joyous shouting of the village children, for whom it was destined, the humblest and low-liest of Russia's millions, as they danced around the tree in expectation of presents and dainties.

The first day of Christmas is usually spent at home quietly, or at some grandmother's house, where a whole family of generations often assembles.

The second day is the day of congratulation. In Russia everybody congratulates everybody else on the holidays. Early in the morning, or what is called early in Russia, from 10 to 11 o'clock, janitors, porters, letter-carriers, telegraph boys, policemen and a great many more who for some reason or other consider themselves entitled to a tip (for this is the purpose of their regular Christmas and Easter visit) send in their congratulations through the back door, for it would be martyrdom to receive these numerous congratulations personally. I am sorry to say not even the clergy are always received, who in a body of three, priest, deacon and cantor, come to offer not only congratulations but also to pour, in rather monotonous notes, blessings on house and inmates. Of course the money is sent to them, for all these congratulations are nothing but a genteel kind of begging which some day, I hope, will be abolished, and it would be an utter impossibility to receive not only all the representatives of the church to which you belong and which costs you quite enough if you are a good follower of the Greek Faith, but also the clergy of other churches, to which you do not at all belong, but to which your long deceased grandfather once happened to go.

In Russia people do not use the "Merry Christmas and Happy New Year." They simply say, "Sprasdnikom," which means, "With the Holidays." The greeting is short but in many cases it means money.

The foreign tourist who happens to spend the second day of Christmas in a Russian city is very much surprised to see so much life in the streets. Hundreds of cabs and private carriages fly across the snow-covered streets: the passengers with a holiday look on their faces and their best fur-coats on their backs, are hurrying to congratulate their lady friends "with the holidays." They must needs hurry, for, in a country where there are no women's clubs, where society is comp sed of men and women, a man is apt to have a legion of friends amongst the fair sex and he is bound during the holidays to kiss the hand of every one. This custom, though it still exists, is beginning to die out. It is tiresome, useless and expensive, considering carriages and tips left at every

The holidays in Russia are a full harvest to footmen and janitors. Amongst the callers there is not one who does not "tip," and amongst the men who open the door of a home, there is not one who does not expect to be tipped, for are not these holiday calls? But these holiday calls are breathing their last. For the last few years gentlemen who do not desire to make Christmas and Easter calls, simply send their card and give the money they might have spent on carriages and tips to some benevolent society, which has their names mentioned in the papers.

On the third Christmas day there is a Court-reception. The Czar receives in the morning the highest representatives of the Council or State, of which he is the president, the senators, the represenatives of the Synod, the army, navy and other swell folks. They are all assembled in one of the beautiful reception rooms at the Winter Palace, before the Czar enters and the whole group, dressed in picturesque gold embroidered court uniforms, standing in a long line, waiting to congratulate Nicholas II on the Christmas holidays, is certainly an interesting sight, but one which does not last long, for his Majesty is not expected to button-hole anybody with a story of his hopes and fears in China-and nobody wants to button-hole him with his own family troubles.

At two o'clock the young Empress receives the wives and daughters of the morning martyrs, for even a court reception is considered a bore by those who have to go over it two or more times in the year.

The ladies who come to congratulate her young Majes'y are mostly dressed in white—by tradition nobody dresses in dark colors when they come to offer good wishes—and they are introduced by the mistress of ceremonies to the Czarina, who shakes hands all around and, if she happens to be better acquainted with any of them, says a few words, and her duty is over and every one is left to enjoy the rest of the holidays, and this is done in high life with a vergeance.

Dinners, balls and troika-parties follow one another. Fancy balls, private or at clubs, theatres and charity associations, are enjoyed by high and low, and even in the villages the young people disguise themselves in all kinds of fancy dress, put masks before their faces and go to surprise their friends in other villages.

New Year's eve is the time for fortune telling, wax melting and other helps to look into the future, and many a village beauty has met her death by venturing out in the icy night in order to meet the "first man," whom she would surely marry.

The dawn of the New Year is usually drowned in champagne, for the New Year is always met in company and its health is drunk in liquid of all kinds, color and price. A great many people leave the city in a troika and go out to one of the great suburban hotels, where they meet the New Year.

Reader, have you ever heard of a troika? It really only means a large, comfortable sleigh, lined and covered with furs, and drawn by a "troika" (three) horses, harnessed a la Russe. The meaning seems simple, but with it is connected every national feeling of enjoyment. Imagine yourself wrapped up to the ears in furs ready to brave old Father Frost, even when severest, reclining in the soft cushions of the troika, with the companion whom you like best. Above you the mysterious blue sky of a winter night with its myriads of twinkling stars as you fly along the frozen road at a speed of fifteen miles an hour, whilst the troika bells jingle merrily in the still, dry air of a Russian winter. And you are going to a place where the sound of music, the merry songs of a choir of gypsies, peals of laughter and the Polish Mazurka will be there to meet you and in an hour or so you will raise the goblet filled to the brim with champagne as, surrounded by your friends, you hear the distant noise of the cannon proclaiming in hundred shots that a New Year has come to greet you.

CHRISTMAS DAYS IN ROME.

BY MADAME SOPHIA BOMPIANI.

There is in Rome and in Italy an old way and there is also a new way. The old way is followed by the great majority of the nation and the new way by only a few. Yet the old is growing heavy and dull with age while the new gives promise of growth and added strength. No sign of this coming change is so clear to the wise observer as the different ways of celebrating Christmas. The old way uses images. The new one does not. And the Presepio and the Christmas tree are emblematic of the two systems of religion which now after the lapse of centuries meet in the so-called Eternal City.

The Presepio is a reproduction of the Stable of Bethlehem where Jesus Christ was born. There in a rocky cavern are wax images, often as large as life, of the Virgin Mother and the child; of Joseph, the Shepherds and the Magi; while other images of placid cows and wise donkeys, the natural inhabitants of the stable, fill up the scene.

The Christmas tree has no images, not even the German Christ-child on the top, but its green, aromatic branches are laden with yellow oranges; with silvered balls and strings of gilt paper; with lighted candles, red, white and green, the colors of Italy; and with flakes of mimic snow. The Sundayschools of the Evangelical Churches in Rome generally have a Christmas tree not only beautiful to see but laden with gifts that make the hearts of the little ones sing for joy. Nearly all of the Roman Catholic Churches have a Presepio, but the most splendid is that of the church of Ara Colli on the historic Campidoglio. There the Madonna holds in her lap the wondrous Bambino Gesu, a dark complexioned wooden doll dressed in gold and silver tissue stuff and covered from head to foot with precious stones. It is believed by the populace to possess miraculous healing power and is often carried in a grand carriage to the sick. The Presepio is on the left of the entrance after you climb the long, long stone staircase that leads up the hill; on the right at Christmas time is seen a platform where children recite hymns and other poems, to the great delight of their respective mothers, aunts, sisters and grandmothers.

Wherever in the smaller churches there is a modest Presepio the mothers gather and urge their lit le ones to recite their hymns of praise to the Madonna and the child. But to the Divine Child alone are the hymns and songs addressed which are repeated by the children around the Christmas trees.

Some time in Christmas week, not always on Christmas Eve, these visions of light and beauty entrance the children in the Waldensian, the Methodist, the Baptist and the other Italian Evangelical Churches. And not only the children but the mothers and the fathers come to celebrate the "Peace on earth, good will to men." Love and joy touch the hearts of young and old. Then is sung the beautiful hymn written by Alessandro Manzoni, set to a melody even more beautiful than the words sung by martyrs and confessors of the persecuted churches since the year 1535:

Ecco ci e nato il Parvolo Ci fu largito il Figlio.

In such grand poetry as this, a hymn of five verses of seven lines each, both Roman Catholic and evangelical Christians can join at Christmas time.

Christmas Eve is a family festival where old and young of three or four generations meet at a supper of fish, eels, nuts, cakes and fruit or vegetables. No meat is permitted, as this is what is called eating magro, but it is none the less a full meal. It is followed next day by the sumptuous dinner, graced necessarily by a fat capon and ended by pan giallo, a kind of coarse nut and fruit cake. Roman children receive no gifts on Christmas Day. They have no legendary Santa Claus with snow-covered cap and furs and bells who comes down the chimney to fill their stockings with long-desired gifts. Their ideal is La Befano, an ugly but very benevolent old woman who brings them dolls, trumpets, little watches, sweets and marbles on the night before Epiphany. As the wise men of the East brought gold, frankincense and myrrh as gifts to the Madonna and Child, the Romans consider that Epiphany is the time to give gifts instead of Christmas. This is a materialistic view of the beautiful custom, very different from that of the Protestant Church, which selects Christmas Day for its observance. Gifts to each other are tokens of joy for the inestimable gift which God in his tender love toward mankind gave that day in Bethlehem.

The people who serve you at home: the baker, the milkman, the grocer, the washwoman, the carpet beaters, the postman, etc., are willing to receive their mancia, a small gift in money, on Christmas Day. They expect it then and one holds a regular levee, purse in hand, until the procession is ended.

Very often there is an interchange of gifts and pleasant words. The baker sends you a cake of pin giallo; the grocer nuts and Malaga raisins; the wine merchant a bottle of rare old wine, and they know they lose nothing by the remembrance.

Services are held at midnight in all the Roman Catholic Churches on Christmas Eve. The most elaborate of these ceremonies is held of course in the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore where the Santa Culla or Holy Cradle in which our Savior was carried into Egypt is allowed to be seen by the devout. It is generally kept in a magnificent reliquary six feet high, adorned with bas-reliefs and statuettes in silver, in the first chapel on the left of the Church. This is the chapel which contains the statues of the mighty and terrible Popes Pius V. and Sixtus V.

This is the Anno Santo, the Holy Year of Jubilee which has not been observed since A. D. 1825. The design is to keep it either once in fifty or in twenty-five years. But as neither 1850 nor 1875 were fortunate years for the Papacy the Jubilee was omitted. Seventy-five years had passed and the ceremony could not longer be delayed although the Pontiff is still a "prisoner" and Rome is not yet restored to him. But the great age of Leo XIII. has given him unusual prestige and the leniency of the Italian Government promised safety and protection to pilgrims if they came to Rome. So they have been coming all the year, except in the heat of summer, from all parts of the Roman Catholic world, a crowd of Servians and Bulgarians, Germans, French, English and Americans. They have visited each of the four ancient basilicas five times and have received pardon for all their sins. The Porte Sante or Holy Doors in each of these churches which were opened with great ceremony December 24, 1899, will be closed with equal care on the 24th of December this year at noon. Then the vestibule of St. Peter's Church will be filled with seats, some of them decked with red velvet and gilt fringe for sovereigns or royal personages, and a splendid throne for the Pope will be erected. He will then, if his frail, aged body lasts until that day, rise from the throne and wearing the triple crown and trailing behind him a silver tissue train three yards long, begin the closing of the Holy Door with a gold trowel as he opened it last year with a gold hammer. bricks that are to close it for another twenty-five, fifty, seventy-five years, or who knows how much longer, are all ready, each one contributed by a noble family and bearing its crest.

Johnson's Dictionary defines the Christmas season as the twelve days succeeding the festival of the Nativity. If we so consider it, this is a time of many functions in the church and city of Rome. There are not only the splendid ones on the great festival but those of the three classes of martyrs during the week, the martys in will and in deed typified by St. Stephen; the martyrs in will but not in fact typified by St. John, the Evangelist; and the martyrs in fact but not in will typified by the Holy Innocents. These numerous festivals, followed by that of the New Year and a few days later by the Epiphany, arrest labor and make these twelve days one long resting time. Families meet together the last night of the year to take a friendly glass of wine and wish each other Buon Anno, Happy New Year; as the clock strikes twelve.

PROF. B. A. HINSDALE.

[The following memorial concerning the late Professor B A. Hinsdale, read before the S nate of the University of Michigan; is a beautiful tribute from the pen of Prof. Isaac N. Demmon.]

The University Senate is again called to mourn the loss of one of its most distinguished members. A man of marked intellectual range and power, of thorough and comprehensive scholarship, and of vigorous personality, has been taken from us; and we shall see his face no more. It is fitting that we pause for a little to take note of his virtues and achievements, and to make record of our deep sense of the loss we have sustained.

Burke Aaron Hinsdale, son of Albert and Clarinda Eyles Hinsda'e, was born at Wadsworth, Ohio, March 31, 1837, and died at Atlanta, Ga., Nov. 29 1900, in his sixtyfourth year. His parents were of sturdy New England stock, the families of both having made their way from Connecticut to the Western Reserve shortly after the close They became farmers or the war of 1812. by choice and in 1836 settled in Medina County, on the land which they continued to improve and to hold till in the fulness of years they passed it on to their surviving children. This farm still remains in the hands of the sons, and a visit to the scenes of his boyhood was a frequent source of recreation to our friend when fleeing for a little from the burden of his college work. Here he was born, the second of five children, and here he grew up amid the privations and struggles and mutual helpfulness and joys of the pioneer household. He knew full well what it was to toil with his hands as well as with his brain.

His early education was obtained in the district school. At the age of sixteen he made his way to Hiram Hill, some forty miles away, where he Western Reserve Eclectic Institute (afterwards Hiram College) had been opened three years before, and which had already become a mount of hope to many young and ardent minds throughout all that region. This spot was henceforth to be the principal scene of his activites for nearly thirty years. One of the last things he wrote was the commemorative address for the semi centennial of the founding of the institute, and some of us know how deeply the story touched his heart. It was here that he first met the young Garfield, who was before him at Hiram and who was about four and a half years his senior. Between them there sprang up a mutual regard and fast friendship which was broken only by the tragic death of the elder. Unlike in many ways, they both possessed striking intellectual gifts, and had common tastes and aims. Their powers were in some degree supplementary each to the other. The older by his abundant vitality and hopefulness cheered and stimulated the younger, who was more timid and less sanguine; the younger by his piercing logic and justness of view often steadied the enthusiasms of the older. Seldom have two friends owed more to each other, or been more to each other.

Hinsdale was always an eager student, and read extensively in a wide range of subjects. He had a singularly re entive mind and thus became a man of large and accurate in'ormation. Most of his life was given to educational work. As a teacher he began at the foot of the ladder, teaching at first in the district schools, then assis ing at Hiram, later chosen a professor, and in 1870 President of Hiram College. He was ordained to the Christian ministry and preached regularly for some years in connection with his teaching. In the sixties he was pastor of the church at Solon, where he also had a school, and later in Cleveland. where he was associate editor of The Christian Standard.

His presidency at Hiram covered twelve years, from his thirty third to his forty fifth year. During this period his powers of endurance seamed inexhaustible. In addi ion to his administrative duties he taught classes in history, philosophy, rhetoric and literature gave frequent public lectures, preached on Sundays, and made numerous contributions to the press. His first book, "The Genuineness and Authenticity of the Gospels," appeared in 1872. In 1878 he published a work on "The Jewish Christian Church" and, the following year, one on "Ecclesiastical Tradition." Some of the reviews written during this period were afterwards gathered into a volume entitled "Schools and Studies" (1884). He was naturally much interested in the presidential campaign of 1880, and at the request of the Republican national committee prepared a "Campaign Text-book," and made a number of speeches in Ohio and Indiana. The death of Garfield called out two books from him: "President Garfield and Education" (1882) with a biographical introduction, and a collated edition of General Garfield's works in two octavo volumes (1883).

In the summer of 1882 there came to him quite unexpectedly the tender of the superintendency of the Cleveland schools. He hesitated for some time to leave Hiram. but finally decided to enter upon the larger field. His organ zing power and thoroughgoing methods were at once felt hroughout the system and called forth unqualified approval from those best fitted to judge. During the four years of his incumbency he published annual reports which attracted the attention of educators throughout the country and which have a permanent value. These reports, together with his contributions to educational journals and his public addresses on educational topis, won him such repute, that when the chair of The Science and the Art of Teaching fell vacant at this University by the resignation of Professor Payne in 1887, the choice of a successor quickly fell on him. He entered upon his work here in February, 1888, and continued in unbroken service to the end, barring a single year spent in study and travelin Europe.

During these years he has been a prolific writer. The following titles will give some idea of the volume and range of his work: "The Old Northwest" (1888), "The American Government" (1891), "How to Teach and Study History" (1893), "Jesus as a Teacher" (1895), "Teaching the Language Arts" (1896), "Studies in Education" (1896), 'Civil Government of Ohio" (1896), "Life of Horace Mann" (1898), "The Art of Study" (1900). A History of the University of Michigan, on which he spent no little research, is now in the hands of the printer. During the past year he also prepared a monograph on "The Training of Teachers," which has won a medal at the Paris Exposition. Besides these he has contributed largely to educational journals, and has written numerous reviews and pamphlets. His published work was always good. "The Old Northwest," written in the interval of leisure between his leaving the Cleveland superinten ency and his coming to Ann Arbor, is one of his most original and sustained productions. His more recent contributions to the International Educational Series are also finished productions and are sure to perpetuate his name. At the time of his death he had plans for other books, the materials for which were largely in hand; and his chief regret at departing from this life seemed to be that he could not finish the work he had set himself to do. But his friends should be thankful that he was able to leave so large a body of good work in a form to endure.

He received academic honors from Williams College, Bethany College, Ohio State University, and Ohio University. He was an active member of the American Historical Association and of the Historical and Archæological Society of Ohio, and an honorary member of the Historical Society of Virginia. He was prominent in the National Educational Association, the National Council of Education, of which he was president in 1879, and of the Michigan State Teachers' Association, of which he was president at the time of his death.

He inherited the physical frame and temperament of his mother. He has himself described her extraordinary force of character, her fertility of resource, her strength of will, her chivalrous courage and immortal hope, her lofty spirit, and her unfaltering devotion to duty. "She was reserved in manner to the world at large, and keenly resentful to injustice and everything mean and wrong." These traits descended to the son. The father was known as "an excellent observer of men and things, with a keen insight into character, a cool temper and careful balance in dealing with men, a power of analysis and description both quaint and picturesque, and a playful, satirical humor." This picture also fits the son. To persons who did not know him well, or who met him in controversy only, he often appeared unsympathetic, sometimes harsh. He was quick to detect and expose the weak points in his adversary's position, and in the nature of things he sometimes incurred dislikes thereby; but he was a man wholly superior to resentments. To his papils he was always warm hearted and helpful. His own early experiences and his life at Hiram bred in him an abounding tenderness for aspiring and struggling youth, and such persons never found him cold or deaf.

THE BIBLE IN PUBLIC EDU-CATION.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

There is just now in the city of Chicago considerable agitation over the question as to whether the Bible ought to be introduced into the public schools in the form of readings of selected character, either at the opening of the school or as a part of the prescribed curriculum at the discretion of the principal. The question has been agitated at times during recent years, but has received special consideration of late owing to the fact that it was recently brought before the school board and dismissed as impracticable, with the assertion on the part of the majority that the Bible is a sectarian book, or at least a book likely to be inter preted in a sectarian manner wherever used. and this would be the cause of dissatisfaction on the part of a large number of pa-

This action of the school board resulted, however, in stirring up people of both friendly and hostile sentiment. It had its origin in a movement some months since to introduce into the public schools a sort of compromise Bible, being a selected list of readings from the Scriptures chosen under the direction of an interdenominational, or perhaps undenominational committee.consisting of representatives of different churches orthodox and liberal, Christian and Jewish. The volume prepared by them was an expurgated edition of the Bible, of which there re nained only such portions as could by no reasonable process lend themselves to a biased view from the standpoint of any particular group of people. All the miraculous elements in the life of our Lord were eliminated; all questionable or objectionable features from the point of view of liberals were suppressed, and only those portions of the Bible which might be considered literature in the sense in which the masterpieces of Greece, Rone, Italy, France and Germany, as well as of our own language, are so estimated, were permitted to remain. It would seem that this collection which had been made to meet all objections would pass without any danger of disapproval; but such was not the case. The Secularist Union of the city, of course, found it easy to stir up prejudice in the minds of those who were but slightly informed of the honest, but perhaps futile, effort of those who had sought to make a Bible acceptable to the anti-biblical section of the community. A majority was secured in the school board and the matter, at least for the time, has received its quietus.

It will thus be seen how strenuous is the opposition to any effort which locks toward the placing of the Bible in the public schools, even in a seemingly diluted and harmless form. As the result of this action, two counter movements have been set in motion in the community. The first is that of the active Christian element, which in the various ministerial associations has registered its protest against the action of the board and has demanded a re-hearing of the mat ter. The other is the Secular Union, which is sowing broadcast over the city tracts and pamphlets mailed, for the most part, to children in the public schools, so far as their names can be secured, belittling the Bible and pointing out in he most glaring terms its supposed barbarisms and immoralities. It is hardly conceivable to one who has not looked into this type of literature to what extent attacks of this kind upon the Bible will go. The features of the word of God which are most indicative of the human and imperfect instruments through which it come to us are pointed out with sneering comments upon the character of a God who would speak in such terms as these. Of course it requires but a small capital of wit and learning to prepare a pamphlet of this character, but the insidious and disreputable manner in which the campaign is carried on in securing access for these vile publications to the children, not only of the public school, but of the Sunday-schools, is sufficiently informing as to the motives and persistence of its promoters.

The fact is that Christian people have been all too supine in their indifference to the place which the Bible ought to occupy in motern education. One has to go but a few years back to recall a time when the Bible had a recognized place in the public school system of England, where Shakespeare and his contemporaries studied it in the common schools of Stratford and in every other town where primary and secondary education was carried on. It is well known that in the early history of our own country the same rule prevailed, and it was only the undue insistence upon the divorcement of church and state which grew out of a somewhat groundless fear of denominational control that finally banished the Bible from our educational program. The result is that not only has it no place in the public school system, either as a part of the curriculum where it ought to be or even as a book for public reading, but it is also considered dangerous to mention its introduction in those great schools organized under public patronage, the state universities. Here the secular process reaches an ideal perfection. While the state universities of Germany, popularly supposed to be the land of skepticism and rationalism, are amply provided with facilities for biblical instruct on, those of our own country have been inhibited from offering courses of this character by reason of fear that they would minister to sectarian interpretation and jealousy. As a result it is to be observed that while denominationalism has thus been deprived of possible nour shment in the atmosphere of state universities, that worst and most persistent form of sectarianism, viz., secularism, has grown apace. The Bible has no place to day in the curricu um of the state university any more than in that of the public school, and yet every other phase of thought which is in any large way germane to the public life may be freely discuseed with any interpretation which the individual instructor sees fit to offer.

In permitting such a condition of affairs to continue, ground has been surrendered of which the secular forces are quick to take advantage, and it becomes more difficult each year to restore the Bible to the place it ought to hold in educational work. Only with a large and vigorous demand on the part of the Christian people for its restoration will there approach the day when it will be less an unknown book than it is at present. The dangers to the Bible from criticism, persecution and ridicule are insignificant be ide those which are of its wn household in the neglect to sudy it, permitted and encouraged by our present educational system, both secular and religious. The movement which is apparent in Chicago is probably equally present in every other considerable city, though perhaps more quietly and insidiously making its way in some places than in others. The Bible needs the fresh attention and devotion of those who are its students and defenders in this effort to put it once more into its rightful place in an adequate educational program.

THE CHRIST IN CONFRAST.-V. A Transcendent Fact.

W. J. LHAMON.

Edersheim pronounces the resurrection of Jesus the best established fact in history. Negative criticism has not been able to set aside the gospel narratives recording this fact. Theories militant to it have not been wanting, but theory has scallowed up theory until, as Joseph Cook says, "the hourglass has swallowed them all." To the candid student of history the resurrection of Christ pecomes an intellectual necessity. Within thirty years of the death of Jesus the church of Jesus has become a transforming fact and power in the activities of that whole cluster of nations birlering upon the Mediterranean. This majestic movement passed outward from Jarusalen by the way of J des and Simaria to "the utter nost parts of he eacth." The church abroad proceeded fro a the charca in Jara sale n. The church in Jecusale n proceeded from the faith of the apostles. The faith of the apostles proceeded from the resurrec tion of Jesus. There is no other cause adequate to such an effect.

On the day of the petrayal Peter denied Christ. On the day of Pen ecost he preached Christ with miraculous power. A mighty change had come over the man. He had passed from doubt to faith; from despair to hope; from fear to fortitude; and from a cirnal to a piritual conception of the kingdom of his Lord. Such conversion is not the result of fickleness or caprile. Between the weakling who d niel and the hero who preached there must be a trans forming fact. Reason de nands it. This demand of reason is answered by the resurrection. The risen Redeemer rather than the crucified Redeemer is the logical link between the disciples who denied and the apostles who preached; between the noonday darkness and the Penterost tongues of flame; between the new tomb and the new church; between Golgotha and all subsequent history of that kingdom of our Christ which shall know no rest till it has made the sign of the cross its symbol of triumph through all the earth.

The Apostle Paul assumed the resurrection of Jesus as the basal fact in all his work. Saul of Tarsus was a soul moulded majestically, great and daring and resourceful and ardent. One vision of the risen Christ transformed him; one Christophanyand persecuting Saul became preaching Paul! He cast his all into the cause of the crucified and risen Redeemer. His life is the most complete example of abandonment, of rational abandonment, to a holy cause in all history. And he lives to-day. His spirit is in our midst while his writings are in our hands. But a crucified and dead and buried Christ is not sufficient to account for such a character and career as those of Paul. A being, however great and holy, who should have dashed himself in vain against the Phariseeism and Sadduceeism and narrow nationalism of Paul's day, and who should have had for his pains nothing more than the cross and the tomb, would never have appealed to Paul. Such a regnant soul can never seek or find one more lofty and regnant than himself in a crucified and buried fanatic and impostor, for such Saul assumed Jesus to be till the resurrection proved him otherwise. But when he saw the risen Savior he saw the revelation of God. A new light flashed upon him from the glory of the empty tomb, and made radiant before him all the pathway and purposes of the risen One. Not in the buried but in the risen Christ he saw a new covenant, a new church, a new revelation, and a new era for the world; he adopted it all, and became its child, its hero, its champion and its martyr.

Not only to Paul but to countless multitudes of believers the resurrection of Christ has been and is the transcendent and transforming fact even in such a transcendent life as that of Jesus. Above, this fact has been spoken of as an intellectual necessity from the historical standpoint. But is there not also a spiritual necessity for it? Does not the soul cry out for some such spanning of the chasm of death? some such proof "that Life is ever Lord of Death?" For some such mediatorial way of mounting up to God out from the very "valley and shadow of death?" At last in the resurrection of Jesus the cry of Job is answered, "If a man die shall he live?" No longer does the soul go groping in darkness and limping upon the crutches of analogy for its answer to that question. It may be helpful to observe that "there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again," but it is not sufficient. Those now who are seeking for glory, honor and immortality, leap to the embrace of the risen Saviour. In view of the living hands holding up their own death wounds such seekers cry out with Thomas, "My Lord and my In view of the resurrection they bend over the graves of their loved ones in triumphant sorrow, saying, "When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

From still another standpoint the resurrection of Jesus is a necessity. We were meditating in an earlier essay upon the claims of Jesus. Such claims cannot be made good if the grave must be their goal. If Jesus assumes to more than merely man, and yet ends his life as a man, he must by that invite not the faith but the doubt of men. If he lives a supernatural life there must be other than a natural ending to it. If we are to accept Jesus at his own high valuation there must be a great harmony running through all his history; the miraculous in his life must be matched by the miraculous in his death; and the miraculous in his death by the miraculous beyond death, even the resurrection. Such a career as that attempted by Jesus must rise climax upon climax, and there must be no anticlimax. The miraculous conception calls for the baptism and the miraculous confession of the Son by the Father there; this calls for the transfiguration and the repeated miracle of confession; this calls for Gethsemane and the miracle of prayer and victory there; and this for the crucifixion, and this for the resurrection, and this for the ascersion. We repeat it, the intellectual demand made by the miraculous conception is for miracle upon miracle, climax upon climax, till the circle is complete, and the final miracles demanded by the miraculous birth rise up before us to cast their glory and their credentials back upon that strange and holy inception. The resurrection and the ascension do complete the circle, so that both in reverence and in reason we may say, such a beginning calls for just such an ending, and such an ending justifies just such a beginning. In the resurrection of Jesus the virgin birth of Jesus has its sufficient explanation and justification. The whole of his earthly history is at the same time a heavenly history, and from the beginning to the end of his career his human life is dynamic with the divine. Of our lives it must be said.

"On earth the broken arcs; In the heaven a perfect round," but not of Jesus. His is a "perfect round' right here on earth, and the perfection of it is its highest appeal to the "sweet reasonableness" of men.

Though no one understood him in all this Jesus understood himself. He knew that there must be continuity of the miraculous in his career in order that there might be harmony between his claims and his character. He knew that as he had vanquished hatred by his love, and sin by his holiness, he must also vanquish death by his resurrection. He knew that perfect mastery in life must be inclusive of perfect mastery in death and over death. He knew the law of continuity, and the necessities of it, and our dependence upon it, and the remedial convictions that must spring from it in the minds of men. It was out of such knowledge that Jesus foretold his death and resurrection to his bewildered and stumbling disciples, and it was because of their incapacity to understand him that the disciples doubted and denied him. Not till the "perfect round" of his life was made, and not till the demonstration of his perfection lay fully before them in the resurrection, did the light and the glory of it all flash fully up into their souls. And not till then was there the possibility of a Pentecost, and of a new baptism, and a new church, and a new kingdom, and era, and beavenly hope.

In all this Jesus stands alone. No compeer can even so much as be suggested. There is a book, it is said, entitled "Sixteen Crucified Saviors;" it must be very rare as compared with the New Testament; the writer has tried to find it, but has been unable to lay his hand upon it. However, who will present us with a book telling us of sixteen risen saviors, or of six, or of two? What the Apostle Peter said of David may be said of all our great ones aside from Christ. "Men and brethren, let me freely speak to you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulcher is with us unto this day." Though Moses said, "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you," yet that prophet was unlike Moses in respect to the resurrection, as in many other points. It is only within certain limits that Moses and Jesus can walk together. Down into the grave they may go side by side, but there the one remains, and thence the other arises. If the burial of Moses has the fascination of romance for the preacher and the poet, the resurrection of Jesus has for them on the contrary the fascination of the supernatural and the eternal. Of the one we say,

"By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale in the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave;
But no man dug that sepulcher,
And no man saw it e'er,
For the angels of God upturned the sod,
And laid the dead man there."

But of Jesus we say, still pointing to the empty tomb, "He is not here; he is risen; come, see the place where the Lord lay."

Simply to mention Socrates in this connection is to throw him into contrast with Christ. Socrates had a theory of immortality, he never dreamed of a resurrection. Something like a shadowy existence, he thought, must happen to men after death. This was the best the Greek had to offer the sorrowing disciples who gathered round him there in the prison on the day of his death. If the Crito heightens our admiration for the stern and high-souled philosopher and martyr, it at the same time deepens our conviction that he is only a philosopher—not a savior.

And Confucius, and Mohammed, they, too, are both dead and buried and their sepulchers are with us unto this day. They are named only that they may be quickly dismissed from the presence of the risen Christ.

The doctrine of transmigration, by no mesns of the resurrection, belongs to Buddha and the Buddhists. Gautama himself, according to the "Light of Asia," was once a tiger—

He won his tigress, fighting for her as in after ages he contended for his bride Yasodhara. Through numberless births and deaths this tiger became Buddha. Then the law of the Karma was fulfilled in him, and transmigration ceased, and he died and passed into Nirvana. And what is Nirvana? The place or the state wherein individuality and personality are lost in the infinite.

Pantheism and not heaven is the goal of Buddhism. Not victory over death but submission to death with final loss of conscious existence is its best gospel.

"The dew is on the Lotus! Rise, great San! And lift my leaf and mix me with the wave. Om Mani Padme Hum, the surrise comes! The dew-drop slips into the shining sea!"

Thus in verse that is wholly faultless and beautiful Edwin Arnold presents the Buddhistic teaching of the annihilation of conscious personal existence. In such a night ends at last the Light of Asia!

One other great Eistern Master remains to be mentioned. He is supposed to have been the prophet of the Magi who visited the infant Jesus. A hundred thousand fireworshipers still gather, after twenty-five centuries or more, round his altars. He ranks among the greatest and purest sages of history outside of the Hebrew race. To Zoroaster there was granted a vision of the resurrection, and therefore the doctrine of it. But from the fact of it and therefore the proof of it, and the experience of it, he was as far removed as all the other great ones, to whom may be fittingly applied the threnody of Isaiah:

"All the kings of the nations, even all of them, lie in glory, every one in his own house."

"Cased in cedar and shut in a sacred gloom, Swathed in linen and precious unguents old, Painted with cinnabar, and rich with gold, Silent they rest in solemn salvatory."

But, O Christ! Thou art not here; Thou art risen! Not in the narrow house, but in our Father's house Thou dost reign in glory!

HOW TO STUDY THE WISDOM LITERATURE.*

OSCAR T. MORGAN.

I. The books of the Old Testament that constitute the W sdom literature are Proverbs, Job and Ecclesiastes. Some would include the Song of Songs. Some of the Psalms would fall under the same classification. The most inportant of these are Psalms 49, 112, 119, 127, and 128. Habakkuk is also as much of a philosophical treatise as a prophecy. The student should not make the mistake of merely reading about these books; he should read the books themselves. This study may be of help to you only if you will use it as a guide through the books.

In beginning the study of these books, it must be remembered that the Wisdom writings of the Hebrews are very different from the philosophy of other nations. There is here no abstract speculation into the nature of the universe and man. These writings are not intended so much to guide the thoughts as to regulate the conduct. The Greeks sought truth to think by, the Hebrews to live by. They were concerned only for the truth that saves.

II. Among the earliest examples of Wisdom are the parable of Jotham (Jud. 9:8-15), and the riddle of Samson (Jud. 14:14, 18). David shows a fondness for proverbs, and uses them frequently. The book of Proverbs, however, is the typical Wisdom book. It is the treasure house of the best thought of Israel on the way to make the most of life. All the practical affairs of life that fell within the range of their observation or experience are here touched upon. It is the greatest text book on morals and manners that the world has produced. Even a very hasty examination will show that this book is made up of a number of different collections. It seems likely that, following the divisions of the Pentateuch and the Psalms, it is intended that there should be five books of Proverbs. The first book contains chapters 1-9 and has the title, "The proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, king of Israel." It is uncertain to how much of the book of Proverbs this title is intended to apply. Quite certainly not to all of it, as several sections are expressly ascribed to other authors. In a sense all the first nine chapters, which constitute the first book, are an introduction to the whole collection. Their aim is to exalt Wisdom and to show its advantages for men. This book is highly artistic, and presents a connected discourse, while the other books are made up largely of disconnected sayings and proverbs.

The second book (chapters 10-22:16) contains a collection of three hundred and seventy five proverbs, all in couplet form, entirely independent of each other, and containing no logical arrangement. There is, however, a certain unity of poetic form. The poetic form, or parallelism, of chapters 10-15 is mostly antithetic. That is, the second line states a truth opposed to the first line:

"Riches profit not in the day of wrath, But righteousness delivereth from death." 11:4.

In the rest of this book, the parallelism is synonymous and comparisons. In synonymous parallelisms, the second line states in different words the same thing as the first:

"He that begetteth a fool doeth it to his sorrow, And the father of a fool hath no joy." 17:21.

In comparisons, two truths are compared:

"Better a dry morsel and quietness therewith Than a house full of feasting with strife." 17:1.

This book is generally considered to be the first one collected and contains, therefore, the oldest proverbs. They reflect the settled life of a prosperous people, and seem to deal with the life of the city more than with that of the country.

The third book (chapters 22: 17-24:34) is in the form of an epistle of a teacher to his pupil. The proverbs here contain four lines, and they are more closely connected than in the preceding book. In subject matter, there is as much of manners as morals, many of the proverbs containing maxims of worldly wisdom and the proprieties of social life. Chapter 24:23:34 is an appendix to this book.

The fourth book (chapters 25-29) goes back to the form of the earliest proverbs, being couplets with no logical arrangement. There are, however, some proverb clusters, having the unity of a common theme. These groups treat of the King, 25: 2-7; Fools, 26: 2-12; Sluggards, 26: 13-16; Hypocritical Words, 26: 23-28.

The last two chapters do not properly constitute a book, but they are rather a collection of miscellany. The collection closes with an acrostic poem on the Capable Woman. In this poem the verses, in Hebrew, begin with the letters of the alphabet arranged in regular order. This is one of the best things in the whole book, and it shows the high estimation in which women were held among the Hebrews.

The student will find it profitable to study this book as a guide manual to social life, and to arrange the material under the various subjects which it treats. These maxims do not grow old with time, as they belong to no one people, time nor country. They are as universal as human nature, and as eternal as human duty.

B. B. TYLER'S LETTER.

Ought Disciples of Christ to receive by the right hand of fellowship unimmersed persons as members of the church in full fellowship? Is it in harmony with their principles to do so? Do not their avowed principles on the subject of Christian unity and union require them to do so?

This question was raised last week by an earnest and dissatisfied correspondent. No effort was made to reply to the puzzling inquiries. Only the difficulty was made to stand out prominently. That there are difficulties connected with the conditions of local church membership was conceded. The difficulties are really greater from one point of view than our correspondent in his statement made them to appear. Nor are they peculiar to the Disciples of Christ. Disciples may face them, wrestle with them, try to get rid of them, while others ignore or turn away from them-but they exist nevertheless. Baptists meet them; Pedobaptists come face to face with them. They are in the way of all Protestants. None are free from the puzzling problem connected with the conditions of membership in the local congregation. The difficulties are quite as real with others as with the Disciples of Christ. Make a note of this fact.

The man among us who preaches the facts, truths, precepts, promises and warnings of the gospel as revealed in the New Testament and who interests the people in a rational study of the Bible will have but little trouble of a practical character at this point. The man whose motto is: Where the Bible speaks and as the Bible speaks I will SPEAK AND WHERE THE BIBLE IS SILENT I WILL BE SILENT, will not be annoyed by those who have not recognized the Lardship of Jesus in the ordinance of baptism offering themselves for membership in the local church. This is a plain and it may be blunt statement of a fact. The fact is indisputable.

The man who is lacking in clearcut convictions and who speaks in a hesitating, apologetic, compromising tone on the great questions of life and death, time and eternity, is the man who secures the secret, if not the outspoken contempt of those whose good opinion he craves.

Dear old Dr. Charles F. Deems, of the Church of the Strangers, in New York, was wont to say to me: "I am a better Disciple than you are! I endorse the principles of the Disciples and apply them faithfully in my church, you abandon them when you come to baptism. I do not trust my interpretation of the ordinance on those who desire membership in the Church of the Strangers. I have a baptistry in my church. I immerse those who desire to be immersed. I sprinkle water on those who wish to be baptized in that way. If persons desire water poured on them in baptism I pour water on them, saying 'I baptize thee.' This you ought to do. Your avowed principles require you to do so, but you do not. I am a better Disciple than you are!"

On one occasion in a meeting of a clerical club, both Dr. Crosby and Dr. Deems assailed me on this point. After I placed before them the position of the Disciples, they said: "If that is your position, if that is the position of the Disciples of Christ, we would only have a contempt for you if you were to pursue any other course than that which is your custom." More than once in that company I heard members express th ir opinion of a man who was attempting to curry favor by the reception of unimmersed persons into the fellowship of a so-called congregation of Disciples of Christ.

Men who are men want a man to believe something and to speak out in plain English his honest convictions. This is the way to popularity—if you have a desire for that.

But what is the teaching of the Disciples in brief? They protest against the divisions in the church both denominational and sectarian. They alone affirm the sinfulness of schism. They say that sectarianism is a sin to be repented of and abandoned as any other sin ought to be repented of and forsaken. They say that the Church of Christ in the beginning, and under the personal care of the holy apostles, was one. Believers ought to be united now as they were then. Th s unity and union is a condition precedent to the conversion of the world to Christ. The bond of fellowship in the Apostolic Church was a com non devotion to the one Lord. So it should be now. The remedy for the existing divisions of Christendom is a return to the Christianity of the Christ as it was at the first-its creed, its ordinances, its life. "Back to Christ" is their cry. Jesus is THE Lord. "Hear ye Him" is the oracle from the Holy Mount.

This, in few words, is the real position occupied by the Disciples of Christ. It is not a goody-goody, namby-pamby plea for Christian union.

There is no question that the Lordship of Jesus was recognized by converts, in the apostolic age, surrendering to him in baptism. No one calls this in question. In this ordinance men said, after the Christ and his claims had been presented, "Here, Lord, I give myself to thee." Of this there is no doubt. This proposition is not open to debate. If any question is set led this is. Now, the plea of the Disciples for a return to the Christianity of the apostolic age-its creed, its ordinances, its life-says that the Lordship of the Son of Man should be recognized in the same way now To pursue any other course is an abandonment of the plea. It is possible that the plea is not practical and should be abandoned, but that is another matter. In this place it is not under consideration.

My correspondent would probably say: "That is all right. The persons of whom I spoke recognize Jesus as Lord, and they believe that they have been baptized."

Was their so-called baptism their act? Generally it was not. As a rule it was the act of some one else. In infancy, by parents or guardians, they were consecrated to God by a ceremony ca led baptism-this, nothing The ceremony was not of their more. The act was not theirs. They did not say: "Here, Lord, I give myself to thee." Nor did those who conducted the ceremony say: "In this is embodied the authority of our Lord. He commands. We obey. The thing we now do, he enjoins. In this service we render obedience to him as Sovereign. In this ceremony we confess that he alone is Lord." This they do not say; this they do not think, nor believe.

Another matter not in dispute is that when persons were baptized in the apostolic age they were immersed in water. No one denies this now—I mean no one who has any standing in the Christian world as a scholar. It is now conceded that the immersion of believers was the baptism of the New Testament times. To this, then, the fundamental principles of the Disciples bind them. For a return to the Christianity of the New Testament—its cree 1, its ordinances, its life—they plead.

What au hority is there for the reception of any person? What New Testament authority is there for the reception of anyone into the membership of the church by the right hand of fellowship? Name the book, the chapter, the verse. Is not this custom a human contrivance and does not much of our trouble originate at this point? Think about this.

One more question. Is not the local congregation, as it now exists, a human institution? Where is a "thus saith the Lord" for such local organizations as we have and call churches? These questions are propounded for the purpose of exciting thought.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

THE DEARTH OF YOUNG MEN.

'In England as well as in America there is a tendency to drive out the old men from every position, that the youngsters may crowd in and come booming along with their green inexperience, as if they were fi ter for trust and work than the tried and trained veterans. The grievance is too familiar to need any expatiation on my part. But, per contra, there are some departments of life's activity in which youth is not in evidence, but age exclusively dominates the scene. For instance, our politicians are at this crisis raising an outcry concerning "the dearth of young men." The occasion of the criticism is a supreme one, for it is the reconstruction of his Cabinet by Lord Salisbury. This process has created much astonishment and even consternation. Lord Salisbury's retirement from the Foreign Secretaryship has neces itated considerable shuffling of offices, and the new arrangement has created much dissatisfaction in the country. He remains Prime Minister at the Queen's request. His friends declare that he has done his best with the material at his d sposal, but that he cannot produce geniuses from his coatsleeve. For some reason or other there is a dearth of conspicuous ability in Parliament at the present monent and the country must put up with mediocrities.

WHERE IS THE BRILLIANT YOUNG MAN?

I have repeatedly heard it said about America that it is full of men of great talent but that genius is very rare. Is the same characteristic coming to be recognized concerning England? I believe that it is. Genius was more frequently developed formerly than it is to-day. We have hosts of clever people but very few of commanding ability. We have not a single preacher to compare with Spurgeon. I have heard all the famous British preachers now alive and I used frequently to hear S, urgeon in his pulpit and in his college. He was incomparably grander in intellect and eloquence than any of his contemporaries or survivors. What they do laboriously he could do without an effort. Exactly the same description applies to Gladstone. In him we have lost the solitary supreme genius in politics. All other parliamentarians are but infants or dwarfs compared with that towering colossus. Of course I am open to contradiction; but I have seen and heard Gladstone. So it seems to be the case throughout the world that the young men are not of equal character with their predecessors. It really seems as though Germany can find no successor to Bismarck. Russia can only produce nobodies after Gortchakof Where is the Frenchman today who could be named in the same category with Thiers? The migh y men have vanished and the seats of the mighty are empty. I do not mean to say that the clever young man is extinct. Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Balfour, Lord Rosebery and Mr Brodrick are gaining influence and making fame, but not one of them is possessed of the qualities which constitute greatness

And men even of this stamp are not as numerous as they should be. Is civilization wearing itself out? Is the influence of mammon, materialism and pleasure-seeking lowering the vigor of the race? I do not venture to answer such a query. I only suggest it.

THE FREE UNITED CHURCH.

A wonderful event, which was eagerly expected, has been consummated in Scotland. The United Presbyterian Church and the Free Church have coalesced and a great Free United Church has been formed. This is a magnificent step in the direction of Christian unity over which we Disciples of Christ must unfeignedly rejoice. It is the most encouraging sign of the times that has occurred in our generation. The U. P. Church began its existence 167 years ago. Its connunion roll to commence with contained 2,000 names. On the day of this recent union with the Free Church it numbered Within its unity are gathered sects each of whose names contains histories, and each of them is fraught with the national life of the Scottish people and the story of the martyrs of her Presbyterian faith. Within her fold are gathered the remnants of the military saints, the Cameronian sect, the Relief, the Secession, the Auld Lichtsmade familiar across the Border by the genius of Mr. Barrie-these and more also. One principle bound together all those within the U. P Church—the Voluntary principle. The Free Church has had a shorter history, one that has had far-reaching effects on the national life of Scotland, and one which can never be contemplated by any thoughtful student without a thrill of admiring emotion. Chalmers and the other men who seceded from the Established Church of Scotland were heroes for consience sake. And now the U.P. Church and the Free Church are one! What would Chalmers have said if he could have lived to see this day!

WINDING UP MY VACATION.

I am writing this letter in Naples, where I am pausing in my homeward flight from Sicily. Of the occasion of my holiday I will here say a word. For who knows but that the word I will say may produce a blessing for some overworked brother minister? I have a dear old friend who was the first deacon with whom I worked as a young minister. Since those days of my youth this grand old deacon has been my fai hful friend. He can afford to take a holiday when he needs it, and also to ask another to share it with him. And he demonstrated his generosity after that manner this autumn, inviting me to travel with him at his expense. What is this but true Christian brotherhood? May I venture to suggest that amongst my kind American readers are some who have profited in this world's good, who could find a congenial traveling companion in the person of some preacher less gifted in material things? I remember how the sainted Timothy Coop, of Southport, when in America took it into his munificent soul to ask an American preacher to accompany him around the world. Could not this kind of Christian socialism be more extensively practised? Well, I have seen Sicily and have just spent a day or two at Capri, the "pearl of the Mediterranean." Instructed, refreshed, invigorated, I return to my Fatherland for a winter of earnest work. I shall be spending my last Sunday on the continent with a remarkable man, Mr. James Wall, the generous Baptist missionary in Rome. Of Mr. Wall I will only say that I wish some of our American Christians of wealth would help in his work. He tells me that there are about 1,000 Protestant church members in Rome, but that sectism is the curse of every evangelistic movement in Rome and throughout Italy. These 1,000 members are divided into six different sects. Accordingly this good Baptist missionary tells me that he is forced into the conviction that the position of the Disciples is right. He thoroughly endorses it. If we could send a missionary to Rome and another to Naples, we should kindle an inextinguishable light in darkened Italy.

THE GOSPEL IN LIFE.

C. H. WETHERBE.

There is much danger that not a few professed Christians will have far more regard for what they consider to be strictly correct views of gospel truth than they have regard for the necessity of their having the gospel in their life. I know of reputed Christians who apparently consider themselves to be divinely appointed guardians of a pure gospel; they insist upon the strictest adherence to the very letter of the gospel; they express great resentment at those in their denomination or church who do not accept some of their views of Bible doctrine; and yet these very men show, by the temper which they manifest towards those who differ from them, that the cardinal principles of the gospel do not have a ruling force in their life. While stickling for strict obedience to the very letter of the gospel they are exhibiting a spirit which is totally foreign to the gospel.

They do not hesitate to accuse those who will not admit their definitions of certain gospel truths of being disloyal to God's word, of being enemies to the gospel, and of standing in the way of the progress of Christ's kingdom. Some of these men are, unfortunately, the editors of religious papers and the influence which they exert over their readers, and especially young readers who are swaved too easily by their leaders. is perilously bad. These readers are misled by the fact that the editor of their paper professes to have an extreme regard for the purity of the gospel and for the most devoted obedience to every requirement of the Bible. This goes a long way with those readers who look more to what seem to them to be loyal avowals of fidelity to the gospel than they do to the temper which is manifested by their editor. And this applies to all church leaders and preachers.

I undertake to say that the editor or preacher who has so much of the gospel in his life that he leads people around him, and all whom he reaches, to see in his conduct the graces of kindness, forbearance, forgiveness, patience with the erring and the spirit of sterling fairness in all relations, does a thousand fold more to favorably inpress the unconverted than does that professed Christian who, though he may have positively correct views of gospel truth, manifests a bitter spirit and a savage manner in asserting his views. It is the man whose life is an evangel of plain goodness that carries conviction to all hearts.

An Educational Convention.

The committee appointed by our Jubilee Convention in Cincinnati in '99 on the recommendations of the Board of Education reported at Kansas City, and, in view of the conditions and overshadowing importance of our educational interests. declared: "We believe the time has come for definite and organic action among the Disciples of Christ for the furthering of Christian education among us. We, therefore, recommend that a committee of seven be appointed by the convention to formulate a plan of organization for an Educational Society among the Disciples of Christ and this committee be authorized to call a special convention for that purpose, either in connection with the next annual convention of this society, or with the annual Congress of Disciples in 1901. or at such other time as may seem to them ad. visable, but not later than the date first named."

This committee consisted of J. H. Garrison, A. B. Pailputt and J. A. Lord. Their report was unanimously adopted and the convention appointed as a committe to carry out this recommendation the following: F. D. Power W. F. Richardson, George Darsie, F. M. Drake, J. H. Garrison, A. B. Philputt, and J. A. Lord. These brethren met at Kansus City and decided to issue a call for an Educational Convention to meet at Lexington, Ky, during the sessions of the Congress, March 26 28, 1901. At such time a plan of organization will be submitted by the committees and we earnestly desire a full representation from all our colleges and all friends of higher education among us.

Children Showed It.

EFFECT OF THEIR WARM DRINK IN THE MORNING.

"A year ago I was a wreck from coffee drinking and was on the point of giving up my position in the school room because of my excessive nervousness.

"I was telling a friend about it and she said, 'We drink nothing at meal time but Postum Food Coffee, and it is such a comfort to have something we can enjoy drinking with the children.'

"I was astonished that she would allow the children to drink any kind of coff-e, but she said Postum was the most healthful drink in the world for ch.ldren as well as for older ones, and that the condition of both the children and adults showed that to be a fact.

"Just a little thought convinced me that one should not take a stimulant such as coffee, but really should have the best food to nourish the brain and nerves, and that nourishment was found in Postum.

"My first trial was a failure. The cook boiled it four or five minutes and it tasted so flat that I was in despair, but determined to give it one more trial. This time we followed the directions and boiled it fifteen minutes after the boiling began. It was a decided success and I was completely won by its ricb, delicious flavor. In a short time I noticed a decided improvement in my condition and kept growing better and better month after month, until now I am perfectly healthy, and do my work in the school room with ease and pleasure. I would not return to the nerve-destroying regular coffee for any money."—F. Scott, Warrensburg, Mo.

Our Budget.

-A Merry Christmas to all.

-"Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth among men and good will."

—"For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace."

—But is his government not likely to be overthrown by the forces of it fidelity and materialism? Let the same prophet answer: "Of the increase of his government and of peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to establish it, and to uphold it with judgment and with righteousness from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts shall perform this."

—Nothing is clearer than that this government of this King, born nineteen centuries ago, has made wonderful progress during the century now closing. His influence as Counselor was never so widely felt in all the departments of life as it is to-day. The facts of history for nineteen centuries confirm the prophetic word: "Of the increase of his government there shall be no end."

—We have elsewhere in this number suggested that our readers make a special effort this year to carry the light and cheer of Christmas into many homes and hearts where it would not otherwise go. We are sure this is what Christ would have us do, and in doing what we know would please him, we greatly enhance our own joy. Too many Christians have yet to find out by experience that the real blessedness of life, its purest happiness, is to be found in following Christ's example, in ministering to others who are in need.

-We are glad to publish this week a tribute to the memory of Professor Hinsdale, from one of his fellow-professors in the University of Michigan, which has been kindly forwarded to us by Bro. T. W. Grafton, pastor of the church at Ann Arbor. Professor Demmon, it seems to us, has given a very just estimate of Bro. Hinsdale, and we are sure our readers will appreciate what is said of him and of his work A boy raised on the farm in Northern Ohio, and only able to attend college by the sacrifice of his parents and other members of the family, he rose to a place of honor and in fluence in the church and in the educational world. He dated the turning point in his life from a question his father put to him one evening as the family were seated about the fire paring apples. "Burke," said his father, lifting up his eyes for a moment, "how would you like to go to school at Hiram?" He related this incident the last time we met him, and his voice was husky with emotion. Henceforth life had new meaning and value to him.

-One of our Missouri pastors sends us a story with a moral that needs no pointing out. The pastor is engaged in a very successful meeting and writes: "My wife has just stepped into my study and related an amusing incident which occurred yesterday. Mrs. --- who is a member of the church here was asked by her little boy if he might unite with the church. She told him he could not. He demanded the reason why. She replied, 'You are too young to understand the duties devolving upon Christians.' The boy insisted that she name some of these duties. The mother answered, 'Well, going to the Sunday-school regularly, attending prayer-meeting and church on Sunday, reading the Bible, etc.' 'Then, mamma,' said the ruthless little logician, 'you are too young to be a member of the church, also, for you never do any of these things!' The mother is the wife of a prominent politician and one of the brightest of our society ladies." The incident carries its own lesson ladies." The incident carries its own lesson. "Out of the mouth of sucklings," etc. —We here and now nominate J. P. Pinkerton, pastor of the Christian Church at Jefferson City, Missouri, as Chaplain of the Senate. Do we hear a second to the motion from some member of that body? Brother Pinkerton represents the strongest religious body numerically in the state, and he is by culture, ability and character, finely adapted for the position. The church in the capital is small and both the salary he receives from it and the duties it demands from him would make it consistent for him to accept the position. Needless to say this suggestion is entirely without the knowledge or consent of Brother Pinkerton.

—J. C. Reynolds, of Macomb, Ill., in a letter dated December 7, says: "I am happy to say that I am in better bodily health now than for the ten years past. I am hungry to preach and am abundantly able to preach now had I the opportunity. But I will be 75 years old one week from to-morrow. That settles it." It is a strange thing if a man with the character and ability of Brother Reynolds, who is able to preach, can find no opportunity to do so simply because he is 75 years old. There are many congregations which could pay Brother Reynolds a small salary and which would be greatly enriched and edified by his instruction and spiritual oversight. We hope some of these will give him a call.

-In another place we print the call for an educational convention by the chairman of the committee appointed at Kansas City to call such meeting and to submit plan of organization for a National Educational Society. The committee held a meeting at Kansas City and decided to call the convention is connection with our Congress to be held in Lexington, Ky., next spring. The notice given elsewhere is the carrying out of this decision, according to the authority given to the committee by the Kansas City Convention. It is believed that we have no more important work before us at the threshold of the new century than the building up of our educational interests, and it is furthermore believed that the organization of this educational society will be instrumental in bringing in a new era of educational development. We trust, therefore, that all who are interested in this work will make a note of this call and remember that the next meeting of our Congress will be one of very great importance to our cause.

-The Chinese Minister, Wu Ting Fang, thinks Christ's saying "love your enemies and bless them that curse you," is "too high for frail humanity," and that "no man of this world could ever attain That is all that Wu knows about Christianity and Christian history. If he had a wider acquaintance with Christian people he would know that there are thousands who do love their enemies in the sense which Jesus meant, and who seek to do them good. "Confucianism," says Minister Wu, "is the highest form of civilization and morality." Witness China, for instance, and the Boxer movement and all the indecent outrages which have grown out of it. Said Archbishop Ireland recently: "Other churches than the Catholic do not demand civil independence and temporal power for their chieftains, because no other church than the Catholic has a world church nor aims at being, at the same time universal and one, nor fulfills the injunction of the Savlor, 'teach all nations.'" Is it not true that various Protestant churches are spreading in all lands except in those where the Roman Catholic power prevails to such an extent that no religious liberty is enjoyed? The Archbishop has not given the true reason. Other churches than the Catholic do not demand civil independence and temporal power because they recognize the truth stated by our Lord when he said, "my kingdom is not of this world." They regard civil government and the kingdom of God as having different spheres and do not admit the principle that the head of the government should be the head of the church, or vice versa. Roman Catholicism holds to a theory of the church that is wholly inconsistent with the principles of our government.

—Do not fail to read, on page 1615, the announcement of the adoption of the "instalment plan" in our Book Department, under the title, "A New Departure."

—The newly coined word of Bro. W. T. Moore, on which he wrote an interesting article recently was not "stereoperfuncty," as it appeared in print and in the copy too, but "stereoperfunctity." This word may find its way into some future edition of Webster, Standard or Century dictionaries, but until then printers will have to be governed by "copy."

—We call attention to the brief editorial elsewhere entitled, "Shall We Fail?" The matter is of unusual importance to the brethren in Missouri. There is a responsibility resting upon brethren and slaters of means in the state, which they cannot evade without incurring the divine displeasure, so far as we are able to discern the duties of the hour.

—In a personal letter from one of our ministers whom we have known for many years, he writes, in the freedom of personal confidence, as follows:

"I know more of my beloved Master than I ever did. It is over four years ago that He revealed Himself to me as He never had done before. Since then the invisible has been to me real. I understand now that fai h is conviction of the unseen, as I am afraid a great many do not. I understand what it is to love your neighbor as yourself I never was able to do that before. Now their sorrows are mine."

It is gratifying to know that many Christians are passing through these deeper experiences of Christian life as the years go by. Why should they not? Is not this just what our Lord expects of us, to be continually getting a clearer grasp of divine things, a firmer hold on unseen realities? Our Lord has many things to show us yet, as soon as we are able to bear them. Alas that so many of us should be content with our meager attainments in the divine life!

A New Departure.

During the year which is just closing the Christian Publishing Company has given more prominence than ever before to its Book Department. This branch of the business has been reorganized and revolutionized. Prices have been generally lowered, special rates have been made on certain sets and combinations of books; three book catalogues have been issued, and thousands of dollars have been spent in bringing our publications to the notice of our patrons, by means of circulars, letters, cards and newspaper advertisements.

The Managers of our Book Department laid down their purpose and policy in these words: "The Disciples of Christ need and should have the books that we publish and sell. It is our business to make it as easy as possible for anyone to secure these books." This is the policy which has been steadfastly pursued during 1900. It was our constant endeavor to make it as easy as pos sible for our patrons to secure good literature. The results have been very gratifying. Our book trade has been much larger than ever before. The people have appreciated our efforts, and we have received hundreds of letters of thanks from grateful patrons.

But we are not content with our success. Our great brotherhood does not yet read enough books. The standard works of the distinctive literature of the Disciples, especially, should have a tenfold greater circulation than they have ever had. Continuing our general policy of making it easy for our people to secure good books, we have determined to extend to our patrons the privilege of purchasing books on the instalment plan.

For example: A preacher, let us say, wants The People's New Testament with Notes, by Johnson ($4.00), Alexander Campbell's Works the Old Faith Restated ($8.00) and ($200). Here are fourteen volumes, price $14.00. This is rather a large sum for the average preacher to pay out all at once. But he writes to us, stating what he wants. We prepare and send to him a contract for him to sign. In this contract he agrees to pay $2.00 down, and $2.00 on the first of each month for six months. He returns the signed agreement to us with $2.00, and we send him the books.

We extend this instalment privilege to all persons known to us, and to those unknown to us who can furnish good references. The instalment plan will not apply, however, to any order amounting to less than $10, nor to orders for song books. The number and size of the monthly instalments will vary with the size of the order. If you want some books, let us know what they are, and we will let you know our best terms. This new plan involves some extra trouble and expense to us on account of additional book keeping, postage, etc., but we make no extra charge to our patrons. We do not add anything to the price of our publications when paid for in instalments.

The Christian Publishing Company owns, publishes and sells practically all of the standard books of the Disciples of Christ, and is, without question, the literary and publishing center of our brotherhood. Above all thought of financial profit, we desire to serve the interests of our cause, and so we are striving to place first-class literature in the homes of our people. Our adoption of the instalment plan in our Book Department is but a part of our general policy to make it as easy as possible for our patrons to secure the very best literature. We shall be much mis taken in our predictions if hundreds do not at once take advantage of this latest plan, and write us of their wants in the way of books.

C. C. Redgrave delivered his illustrated lecture, "In the Footsteps of the Pioneers," at Bethany, W. Va., Dec. 11, to a large and interested audience. Mrs. Decima Campbell Barclay says that it inculcates and illustrates our religious views in a singularly forcible and attractive manner.

The tenth annual report of the Board of Negro Education and Evangelization contains much interesting and encouraging information. Southern Christian Institute at Edwards, Miss, is in a particularly healthy condition and is doing a m st wholesome and practical work.

STRICTLY SCIENTIFIC

Only One Pile Cure Which Can Be Considered Such.

The Pyramid Pile Cure is strictly scientific both in its composition and in its therapeutic ac ion, and the best feature is that it is perfectly harmless. No ill effects ever result from its use.

The cure is accomplished painlessly by the astringent properties and healing oils contained in it, which cause the little tumors and congested blood vessels to contract and the obstruction to the circulation to be removed.

The Pyramid Pile Cure is in suppository form and far superior to any salve or contment for convenience.

It is applied at night and absorbed into the sensitive rectal membrane, acting both as a local and a constitutional treatment.

One 50 cent box of the Pyramid has often been effectual, even in cases of many years' standing.

Relief from pain and itching is so imm diate that patients sometimes imagine that the remedy must contain some form of cocaine or opum, but a careful analysis shows it to contain no coction, anæsth tic or injurious drug of any kind. It is guiranteed free from any deleterious substance.

K. W. White, pastor of the church at Salisbury, Mo, was recently the victim of a surprise party, perpetrated by well meaning memoers of his congr gation. We extend our sympathies or congratulations according as the case seems to him to de-

Mrs. Harness, of Atlanta, Ill., who has for many years been a friend of Eureka College, has recently promised a gift of $5 000 to be used in the purchase of books for the college library, the amount to be available as soon as there are 250 students in the college. Eureka ought to have that many students and a great many more and we hope that she will be enjoying the double blessing of an in creased attendance and an enriched library.

Leslie W. Morgan, late of Atlanta, Ill., has completed the first year of his pastorate at Southampton, England. During that time he has achieved notable success in a field which is far from easy. Floating debts to a considerable amount has been paid, Sunday school, Endeavor Society and missionary societies greatly enlarg d and offerings for missions much increased. There have been 36 additions to the membership. The congregation celebrated the anniversary by special services and a 'tea meeting."

It is announced that Rev. James Parker of London, is to assume editorial charge of one of the London daily papers for one week and make an experiment in practical Christian journalism, some what on the plan of Mr. Sheldon's Topeka experiment. Dr. Parker may, perhaps, without injustice to anyone else, be ranked as the most influential prescher of the present time and his undertaking will naturally command wide attention on both sides of the Atlantic. It is understood that his idea is not to attempt to make the paper religious, but merely to make it clean, truthful and wholesome.

The School of Pastoral H-Ipers at Cincinnati is just closing its fall term. Six applications have been received from city pastors who desire women assistants. Several will be ready for work by the end of Mav. Applications should be addressed to A. M. Harvuot. The second term opens January 15.

The church at Rewell, N. Mex., desires to secure the services of an efficient pastor. It is a live and growing town of 3,500 in a live and growing territory, which will soon be a state, and is said to have good graded schools, worthy so iety and superb cl mate. The membership is 240 and the salary $800. Write to C. M. Bird, Clerk.

The church at Virden, Ill., gave a public reception Thanksgiving night in hon r of the retiring pastor, Paul H. Castle, and the new pastor, C. A. Burton. I is fortunate that there is to be no interval between pastorates and that the new pator is on the gr und so that Bro. Castle's exceent work in that town can be carried on without a break.

Illinois Bible-s hool superintendents are reminded that the I. C. M. I. has decided to in augurate mission work in at least four places in the state, Bradford, Wyoming, Kewanee and Galva, to be supported by contributions from the Sunday-schools of the state. Last year only one school in ten contributed to the state work. Send money to A. C. Roach, Wyoming, Ill.

During his year and a half of work in Foledo and Cumberland county he has assisted in building or improving four churches, held seven prograsted meetings with one hundred additions, held thirty church rallies and two county meetings and aided W. H. Waggoner in five missionary institutes. He would like to vit churches near Mattoon.

W. C. Swartz, secretary of the seventh district in Illinois, sends us a printed report of the progress of the work there during the last quarter, which shows that 'Egypt' is very much alive. Isaac Beckelheimer is state evangelist for that district. Every church which he has visited except one has made a contribution toward the work. Bro. Swartz says: "We have a better class of preachers here now than five years ago, more enterprising chur hes and, best of all, a vigorous and nealthy desire for a more educated and devoted ministry."

It is pretty generally known that Rev. G. Campbell Mork an, of London, is to come to America as Mr. Moody's successor. The statement is only partly true. In the direction of the educational work at Northfield, Mr. Moody will be succeeded by his two sons, William and Paul, and his son inlaw, Mr Fitt. Mr. Morgan will engage in evangelistic work, as Mr. Moody formerly did, making Northfield his center. He is already well known in this country and tis unusual adaptability, together with his previous acquaintance with American ideas and methods, gives ground for the expectation that he will be readily Americanized.

The Convention of Theological Students and Professors held in Allegheny, Nov. 1-4, was the largest and most representative gathering of the sort ever held. The report, which will soon be issued, will contain many reports of deep interest. Orders sent before the end of this mo th to S. Earl Taylor, 3 West 39th St., New York, will be filled for 35 cents, paper edition, or 60 cents cloth bound.

We have heard with deep regret of the recent death of Brother B n C. Herr, formerly a student at Eureka, and later at Kentucky University and pastor successively of the church s at Jet, Ky., and Norfolk, Va. His death occurred at Colorado Springs, Col., whither he had gone in search of health. He was a young man of brill iant talents, of singular versatility, of amiable disposition and of sterling integrity. He had already begun to fulfill the expectations of his friends who predicted for him a brilliant and useful career. He leaves a wife and infant son.

During the months of January, February and March the work of the Bethany C E. Reading Courses will be concentrated in the study of the pionees and the plea of the Disciples of Christ. Now is a good time to take up this work if you are not already pursuing it. The handooks of this department are: oncerning the Disciples, by B B. 'yler; Sketches of our Pioneers, by F. D. The church to which he goes in Chicago was organized in July, 1897, and meets in the People's Institute, the largest auditorium on the West Side.

J S. Hughes, Station O, Chicago, has been delivering his series of lectures, Seven Nights with St. John," to appreciative audiences in the Central Christian church, Des Moines, Ia., Bro. Breeden, part r. It seems to be Bro. Hughes' mission to bring this neglected book of Revelation into the prominence it deserves at this time when the very conflict between the Son of God and the mighty world powers with which the book deals is attracting the attention of all who have eyes to read the sins of the times. The whole Johan ine literature is emphasized and the "beloved disciple" given his rightful place in the development of Christian dootrine and life in these lactures.

An impressive ser-ice in memory of the late Pr f Burke A. Hinsdale was held in the Euclid Ave. Caristian Church, of Cleveland, on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 9 It was pe uliarly fitting that such a service should be held in this city, and in the church where for many years he held member ship. Between his presidency of Hiram College and his professorship in the University of Michigan, he was superintend nt of the public schools of Cleveland. The church was completely filled. Many prominent educators were present. Addresses were made by Miss Harrist Keeler, assistant principal of the Central High School, T. H. Johnston, principal of the West High School, Frederick A. Henry, attorney at law, Miss Ellen G. Reveley, public school supervisor and Harris R. Cooley, pastor Cedar Ave. Church. Miss Keeler and Miss Reveley spoke especially of his work in the educational world and of his abiding influence on the public school system of Cleveland.

that horrible plague, I have a harmless remedy, which I discovered by a fortunate chance while an invalid from rheumatism, and in order that all afflicted readers of this paper may learn about it, I will gladly mail them a trial package with book on rheumatism free.

This wood arful remedy cured many cases which defied hospitals, drugs and medical skill, among them cases of upward of 52 years' standing. This is an honest remedy that has been a God-send to hundreds of former sad homes. In Denham, Ind., it cured a lady, who afterwards cured 15 of her neighbors. In Fountain City, Wis., it cured Hon. Jacob Sexauer after employing seven physicians, and after suffering for 33 years Rev. C. Sund of Harrisvill, Wis., test fies that this remedy cured two members of his congregation, one who had suffered for 18, and the other 25 years. In Plain City, Ohio, it cured Mr. N. J McMasters after prominent doctors of Columbus, Ohio failed. In Lake City, Iowa, it cured a case of painful Lumbago. In Elmgrove, Wis., it cured a case of Sciatica, which had baffled prominent physicians. In Bolton, N. Y., it cured a gentleman at the age of 83 years. In Lyells, Va., this reme ly cured a lady, after having been paralyzed for years, caused by rheumati m, she can now walk as well as ever. In thousand, of other instanc a the result has been the same. It is not a Liniment but an internal remedy which banishes rheumatism by its action on the blood. It also cured hundreds of other persons of the age of 70 and 80 years and over, some of whom had suffered for over years and over, some of whom had suffered to total 40 years.

New York Letter.

The New York sweat shop is one of the most deadly menaces to industrial society, and great vigilance is exercised upon the part of the state and city to regulate and curtail its evils. At a recent meeting of the church association for advancing the interests of the poor, preliminary steps were taken to secure needed legislation on this matter. The Consumers' League, which for several years have been doing their best to induce the public to patronize the honest merchants and manufacturers, now state that new difficulties are continually met with. So many foolish people demand foreign labels on their goods that unscrupulous merchants so label their wares, though made within five minutes' walk of the Bowery. While it is not an encouraging sign that people want to be fooled, and that tradesmen are willing to fool them, yet it is not so bad as the dissemination of deadly diseases through the garments made in the sweat shops of the great east side tenements. Sin and suffering among the poor bear fruits of bitterness and death, not only in the aweat shops, but through the garments made there and borne into the homes of the rich. Truly no man lives unto himself. Disease is no respecter of persons. There is a natural unity of mankind that ought to make us all realize a universal brotherhood. Tenement House Reform is not for the benefit of the poor alone but for that of the whole community.

The question of Creedal Revision among our good Presbyterian brethren is making progress, and is of interest to us all. The New York Presbytery, one of the most influential in the country, voted by a small majority in favor of letting the Westminster Standard remain as it now is, undisturbed. But the general committee of sixteen, having canvassed the returns of all the Presbyteries, say that the votes indicate plainly, (1) That the church desi es some change in its creedal statement: (2) That no change is desired that would in any way impair the system of doctrine contained in the Confession of Faith; (3) That a new statement of old doctrines is desired; (4) Many of the returns show a desire for a revision of the present Confession; (5) That the committee of sixteen recommend to the General Assembly changes in agreement with the above findings. Dr. Van Dyke, of Princeton, says there is not the slightest indication of a coming split in the church over the question of a restatement of their doctrines or a revision of their creed. But many of us believe with Dr. Parkhurst who said: "Put the dear old Confession in a museum as a relic and let us have no more creed than John 3:16, with its fulness of meaning." That, said he, is enough. The agitation must result in good to the cause of Christ in general.

New York is being stirred more and more deeply with the need of social and civic redemption. The Chamber of Commerce, representing more wealth than any like association in this country, is inaugurating a campaign against vice and crime. Bishop Potter's crusade gathers strength every day. The city pastors of all denominations are preaching upon the need of reformation, and the volunteers of Ballington Booth are planning to inaugurate a new movement, to be known as the Volunteer Tenement Work. The preachers and the churches should stand together for the purification and the uplifting of the cities of their habitation. Good work of reformation will lead to the good work of regeneration in many cases. S. T. WILLIS.

In cases of catarrh Hood's Sarsaparilla heals the tissues, builds up the system, expels impurities from the blood and cures.

Galveston Letter.

The brethren everywhere have, I know, been anxious to learn of our welfare in this city during these sad weeks, and are ready to rejoice with us in any success in the eff rt to gather up and heal and go forward in the work.

We are comfortably situated in the house of Sister A C. Barden in the west end, a building which miraculously stood during the storm. We are among the drift; we look south a mile to the gulf shore and see ragged remains of "Salt Cedar" and yard shrubbery, a few fence posts and an occasional bent telephone pole among the piles of drift-lumber, furniture fragments, remains of trunks, rags, pieces of vehicles, stoves, dolls, books, photographs, bedding, cradles, jewel-cases, and all else that clustered around the hearthstones which flourished thickly all over this now a wilderness. Here and there as I write can be seen people gathering the wood to burn on the ground before the tents further down the beach, or searching where the home stood for a chance relic of something or somebody cherished in other days. Perhops that man just under my eyes at this moment was down town at work the afternoon of the storm could not reach home and is the only one of the family left. There are many such. Perhaps that woman now represents the family; she is in black -over half of the people are in mourning-she floated on a house-top for five hours, out into the gulf, then back, when the wind turned, and was drifted against some standing house, taken in naked, resuscitated and given what clothes could be spared.

Farther down east there are some small, unpainted houses which have been put up, for those who have their lots of ground left, by the relief committee. Some of these people have meagre furniture; some have nailed up temporary tables, chairs and beds out of boards taken from the

One bare spot just a block before my eyes is the site of the home of one of our estimable sisters who, with her husband and little Sandford, were living in a beautiful home recently erected through the aid of the Loan Association. By the help of relief, they will erect a $250 home on the same spot, but they have nothing with which to begin house keeping. I know some of our people will desire to have a share in this humble home. A number of boxes of personal clothing, fifteen, perhaps, have come to me already. We are not in special ne d of supplies of this kind now. But kifts of bedding and house linen are needed. We have several cases of destitution like the above.

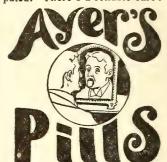

We have now thirty-five church members living in the city. Some half dozen members have come from elsewhere since the storm. One-third of the children who were in the Sunday-school are now with us. The school was re-rganized four weeks ago. We now hold the full line of regular services on the Lord's day. Our audiences are about two-thirds of their former size. By the help of a protracted meeting we hope to build up again straightway. The gifts to rehabilitate the church building and free it from incumbrance, and put the work on its feet again, have been very generous so far.

God bless you, brethren; you have been happy in the act of your giving. We have been able to take advantage of some financial opportunities for the advancement of the church which will be reported later. Some have written me concerning business in this city. There is a tremendous traffic going on just now, and the shipping business in, strange to state, greater than ever before at this period of the year. When the relief money is expended, during the spring and summer, there will no doubt be a going down of business. Then will come the hardest time of all

MARCH 6, 1829 - NOVEMBER 10, 1900.

There is much in the life of the subject of this sketch that calls for more than mere passing mention. The example of godly men is the heritage of susceeding generations.

The blood of the Huguenots flowed in Dr. Gerould's veins, and doubtless many of the admirable traits exemplified in his life are directly traceable to a noble, heroic ancestry.

He became a Christian at the age of eighteen. It was a case of whole-hearted surrender of himself and of all the yet undeveloped powers and resources of his being to the Christ whom he accepted as his personal Savior.

He made choice of the medical profession as the one in which he might best glorify God by serving humanity As a physician he was singularly painstaking and conscientious. There are many to-day of "those who deemed his skill delayed their death hour" whose hearts grow faint at the thought of his loss. Suffering and helplessness and want always appealed to him, and the hand was ever ready to answer to the generous heart's behest. The record of his numberless benefactions is on high. By a sort of spiritual intuition which is granted to souls in tune with the Infinite, to those who say habitually "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth," he seemed to know just when and where his gifts were needed. Speaking from personal experience, I recall several instances in the first years of the Mahoba mission when his timely help came just at the moment when most needed, tiding us over some of the hard places such as are inevitable at the beginning of such a work.

In the marriage of Dr. Gerould to Miss Julia J. Clapp, of Mentor, O., in 1870, we have a felicitous union of two souls actuated by a common purpose in life and dominated by the same spirit of loyalty and devotion to their common Lord. For thirty years they lived together "as heirs of the grace of life," planning and working, sorrowing and rejoicing together. For a few brief years their home was made bright by the presence of little children. When the stroke which rendered them childless came they comforted each other and together turned to lighten the burdens of other stricken ones. "You have comforted me in my sorrow" is the testim my, not of one alone, but of Dr. Gerould will be longest and best remembered among us perhaps as the staunch friend and liberal supporter of world-wide missions. Every department of our common church work found in him an advocate and helper. His interest could not be confined within the limits which some Christians set for themselves. Each of our foreign fields has recived very practical evidence of his interest in its work. He was the first person in our brotherhood to assume the entire support of a missionary, thus securing for himself a rep resentative in the for-ign field. It was not that he was better able financially to do this than are hundreds of Christians who seem to prefer to live in houses of cedar and deny themselves no luxury while the cause of their Lord appeals to them in vain. The example of one who, considering himself but "a steward of the manifold grace of God," preferred to spend and be spent that Christ might e magnified and the world redeemed, rather than live in ease and luxury, is one that ought not to be lost.

Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity.

This is the month, and this the happy morn Wherein the Son of Heaven's Eternal King Of wedded maid and virgin mother born, Our great redemption from above did bring; For so the holy sages once did sing That he our deadly forfest should release, And with His Father work us a perpetual peace.

That glorious Form, that Light unsufferable, And that far-beaming blaze of Majesty Wherewith He wont at Heaven's high council-table To sit the midst of Trinal Unity, He laid aside; and, here with us to be, Forsook the courts of everlasting day, And chose with us a darksome house of mortal clay.

Say, heavenly Muse, shall not thy sacred vein
Afford a present to the Infant God?
Hast thou no verse, no hymn, or solemn strain
To welcome Him to this His new abode,
Now while the heaven by the sun's team untrod,
Hath took no print of the approaching light,
And all the spangled host keep watch in squadrons bright?

See how from far, upon the eastern road,
The star-led wizards haste with odours sweet:
O run, prevent them with thy humble ode
And lay it lowly at His blessed feet;
Have thou the honor first thy Lord to greet,
And join thy voice unto the Angel choir
From out His secret altar touch'd with hallow'd

A Christmas Experiment.

BY ALICE CURTICE MOYER.

Louise Hartman walked home from the office in which she was employed, Christmas eve, a very lonely, homesick girl. Everybody she met wore a look of so much Christmas gladness that her heart became exceedingly heavy before she reached "home." To be alone in a great city of strangers on Christmas was anything but a pleasant situation. Only a few months before she had left her home in the country to take a position in the city. Her salary was not as yet sufficient to allow of any such indulgence as a trip home. So she wrote the dear homefolks a cheerful letter, wishing them a happy Christmas, and expressing a regret that she could not be with them, but said nothing of the great loneliness and homesickness that had taken possession of her as the holidays drew near. The mother who read the letter, however, read also between the lines and knew what her child was enduring to be compelled to spend Christmas, for the first time, away from home.

"Dear child," she said as she kissed the letter. "Mother's heart aches for her, but she is a brave lassie and will bear it heroically. How sorry I am that we could not pay the cost of her railroad fare but unexpected expenses have come to us and it was, just at this time, impossible." And then, mother-like, she did the best she could to help the other members of the family to have a pleasant time, wondering the while what Louise could be doing, feeling sure she would have a full account of how she spent the day in her next letter. This mother is a special friend of ours, and we gained her permission to give the letter in full, thinking that it might be helpful to others:

Dear Mother:—On the evening after writing you that letter in which I tried so hard to put a little cheerfulness (but no doubt you understood) I returned to my boarding house so utterly miserable that I could eat no supper. I just went to my room, resolved to be as miserable as possible. I had hardly made that resolve before there came to mind the words, "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son,"-and it came to me all of a sudden that it was wicked to be so miserable when such a gift had been given to me, -not only to others but to me. The real significance of Christmas came to me then as it had never come before. God gave to us his only Son, that through him we might have eternal life. Because of this priceless gift, ought we not to try to give something in His name-to do something for His sake—at this time? I had no money with which to buy presents, but I wondered if there might not be some service that I could render to somebody in order to show my appreciation of God's great gift to us.

At that moment I heard the cry of the sick baby in the room next to mine, and I remembered that the mother of that baby had had but little rest for nights and nights from taking care of it. I had seen her as I came up to my room, looking so worn that I was sorry for her, but I was so much sorrier for myself just at that present moment that I did not stop to think that I might relieve her for a time that she might be able to get a little much-needed rest.

I got up immediately and went in to inquire concerning the baby, and to ask permission to watch at least half the night with it. My offer was accepted with gratitude. As I sat beside the baby's cot and saw the poor, tired mother asleep on the bed, a sort of peace began to creep into my heart, and to nestle there. It was still there when I arose the next morning at the usual hour, none the worse for my half-night's vigil.

Upon going down to the dining room at breakfast time, I found no breakfast on the table. Mrs. Johnson is always so prompt with her meals (you know she is a widow and keeps a few boarders to help make both ends meet) that I was surprised. At that moment her little 12 year-old daughter, Addie, appeared, half crying. "Oh, Miss Louise," she said, "mother was taken so sick during the night that she could not get up this morning, and I am having such a time with the breakfast. The fire never was so slow, and the cakes just won't brown and—and—" and here Addie cried outright.

How glad I was at that moment that I had been brought up by a wise mother who believes that girls should know how to cook as well as to play the piano. I soon brought order out of the kitchen chaos and breakfast was not so very late after all. I felt well paid afterward when Mrs. Jonhson said, "My head felt better as soon as I heard that you had come to Addie's rescue. She ran up to tell me at once." A woman was sent for to take charge of Mrs. Johnson's other household duties for the day and so my services were no longer needed. I was wondering what next I could do when I heard our next-door neighbor, who had come in to see Mrs. Johnson a moment, say in answer to a question:

"No; I am sorry to say I cannot attend service this morning. I so seldom have an opportunity to go to church. The babies are too small to take and I cannot leave them alone. I would so much like to go this morning though," she concluded wistfully.

Here was another opportunity, so I said:

"Mrs. Gleason, I had not intended going to church this morning, and I will take care of the babies while you go." (Of course, mother dear, you know I would not tell all this to anybody but you; others might think that I felt I was deserving of praise. I know you will understand that I only wanted to do what I could because of the reasons given in the first part of my letter.) You should have seen how pleased Mrs. Gleason was. A chance to attend Christmas service was an oasis in her desert life. I quite enjoyed my little stay with her twins for whose sake the faithful mother sacrifices, willingly, all recreation. As soon as she returned from church I went over "home" (this is what I sometimes call my boarding house) and found that it was time for our one o'clock dinner. Before leaving the table Mr. Munro (whom, you know, is one of the boarders, for I have often spoken of him before) said:

"Miss Hartman, I need some one to go with me this afternoon to visit a North end family in whom I am interested. Would you go?" I told him that I would. I helped him carry his baskets and I am so glad I went. It was a pleasure to me to see their wants relieved, and it was a lesson to me in thankfulness as well as Christmas giving. I never before realized how rich I am. I have health and strength and ability to earn a livelihood. I was made to see also how blessed a thing it is to give to those who are in need, no matter whether it is Christmas or the 4th of July or any other day of the year. Mr. Munro is not a rich man by any means but he is a very happy one. I know he is compelled to deny himself many things in order to give to this family, but he is the sort of Christian that lives his Christianity. (Mother dear, I know you will suspect something because I do so fill my letters with Mr. Munro, and I will confess here and now that I have a very sweet secret to whisper to you when I see you; I cannot write it down in plain, cold, hard words. But do not worry, mother; you will not lose your lassie soon. Mr. Munro has much to do yet, and of course he must win your approval, but you cannot fail to approve when you come to know him.) I felt that I wanted to do something for this family too, and just as we were leaving I put a dollar into the hands of the woman without Mr. Munro's knowing it. It was but a mite but it was all I could do. I was sorry that I could not give more. I had been saving that dollar for a pair of new gloves but I can wear my old ones for a time yet and am glad to do it.

On the way home Mr. Munro told me a story that he said he used to hear his father relate:

Two neighbor boys who were friends were always complaining about the rough, stony path over which each had to pass in order to reach the home of the other. At last the father of one them said: "Why don't you clear the path and stop your grumbling?" "Oh," said the boys, "we could never get all the stones out of the path. There are so many." "Perhaps," said the father, "it would not be possible for you to clear the path in one hour or one day, but if each boy every time he passes over that path would remove one stone, you would be surprised to see how soon the path would be cleared." The boys acted upon this suggestion and finally not a stone was left in the path. Mr. Munro says that this story has always been a help to him. He says that if each of us would make it our business as we go through life to take some little hindrance out of the way of another, to give of whatever we have whenever opportunity offers, whether it be money, time, talents or service, this would be a happier world. This idea was not new to me, of course, because you, mother, have always taught your children such principles, but it did me good to be reminded of it.

It was evening when we reached home. I sat with the sick baby two or three hours (as next day was a work day I could not stay up so late as before), and went to bed a happy girl. And, mother dear (I must tell you this), just as I was dropping off to sleep, it seemed that I could see the dear Savior's face looking at me kindly; it seemed that I heard his dear, kind voice say the words: "She hath done what she could."

Your loving daughter,

Louise.

The first Christmas in New England was spent in toil; all other Christians in the world that day stayed their hands, but the Puritans, in grim and silent protest, did not rest. "We went on shore," writes Mourt, "some to fell timber, some to saw, some to rive, and some to carry; so no man rested all that day.'

However, Bradford's record of Christmas time in the following year shows that it was difficult to repress the joyous frolic of the day even at the farthest outpost of extreme Puritanism. In November, 1621, about a year after the arrival of the "Mayflower," came the good ship "Fortune," bringing a welcome addition to the Plymouth settlement. "Most of them," Bradford tells us, "were lusty young men, and many of them wild enough," adding: "And here with I shall end this year, only I shall remember one passage more, rather of mirth than of weight. On ye good day called Christmasday, ye governor called them out to work (as was usual), but ye most of this new company excused themselves and said it went against their consciences to work on ye day. So ye governor told them that if they made it a matter of conscience, he would spare them until they were better informed. So he led away ye rest and left them; but when they came at noon from their work, he found them in ye street at play, openly; some pitching ye bar, and some at stool ball and such like sports. So he went to them and took away their implements, and told them that it was against his conscience that they should play and others work. If they made ye keeping of it a matter of devotion, let them keep their houses, but there should be no gaming or reveling in ye streets. Since which time nothing has been attempted that way, at least openly."-Richard Cramer, in Ledger Monthly.

A Christmas Song.

BY PHILLIPS BROOKS.

Where children pure and happy
Pry to the bless d Child;
Where misery cries out to Thee,
Son of the mother mild;
Where Char ty stands watching,
Ani Fatth holds wide the door,
The dark nigh wakes, the glory breaks,
And Christmas comes once more.

O, Hely Child of Bethlehem,
Descend to us, we pray;
Cast out our sin and enter in;
Be born in us to-day.
We hear the Christmas angels
The great, g ad tidings tell;
O, come to us, a side with us,
Our Lord Immenue!

STRUGGLING TOWARD THE LIGHT.

BY WALTER S. SMITH.

Chapter VIII.—In the Field; Word from the River.

"Paul" and "Timo by!" Attractive combination! Timothy at first said "Professor," according to the custom of the Bend; for that had seemed to him the most appropriate designation for a tacher who was always equal to his obligation; but, now hat the teacher was preaching, and preaching as well as he taught, and as his name was Paul, he felt that the apostle's name was more fitting. In fact, he was glad to think of hi uself as "Son Timothy."

On Saturday, March 2, Paul stepped off the train with two heavily packed valises, and stood on the platform of the Freedom railroad station. An elderly gentleman in plain of thing approached him and said: 'Is this Professor Guthrie?' at the same time extending his hand. Guthrie tok it and shook it warmly. 'Martha, this is our minister,' said the older man. 'Bro. Guthrie, this is my daughter, Martha Keene.' Paul thought he saw, in these two, a spirit of Christian consecration; and he afterward found his view correct.

Paul had in the values, (1) his raiment, including a baptizing suit, (2) a rare collection of books, which he made useful in his work. Fixing things about him in his room in convinient order he bathed his face and sat down to rest. The room to which he was sent was in the second story, with heat and light and air in abundance.

There was a table, large enough for all his books, with lamp-room and writing-room to spare. There was a wash-stand with pitcher and bowl; and the pitcher was full of rain water. There was plenty of soap, and the good wife had provided two towels; so that the weary preacher migh enjoy a bath without going to the barber shop for it. The table was arranged, with rare good sense, in such a way that the light came to it from the left shoulder of the one who sat before it to write. The looking glass, too, was so placed that the prea her could stand before it with the light in his face; and the wash-stand had its full outfit of combs and brushes and water service. And while Paul sat and looked over all these marks of genuine and sensible hospitality, he inwardly hoped he might stay there all the time. For, truly, it is not eve y good housekeeper who understands the art of providing a room for the comfort of a guest.

He need not have given himself unersiness, for in the whole four weeks he stayed in Freedom he had not a single invitation to lodge elsewhere. "Uncle" Reuben Stanley, as his neighbors called the old man, and Aunt Crete, as they called his gentle wife, had all the burden of the church to carry, so far as entertainment of the preacher was concerned; and no preacher, lately, had thought of going anywhere else. The daighter was quite inclined to bear her part of the burden; but her burdens at home were such that she could do but little.

So little vitality had the congregation at Freedom that often they had no preaching for a year at a time. Just now, a brother was visiting hem on e a month, preaching two good sermons, staying with Brother Stanley over Sunday, and resurning to his home forty miles away on Monday. Martha Keene was superintendent in the Sunday-schol; and she and her parents were paying a full half of the minister's salary. She was a good manager and almost half of her portion she secured from the sunday set ool.

Dr. Doolittle and Farmer Fussy paid a half dollar a month apiece; and one good brother and his family, five miles away, as sisted by his two daughters paid the balance.

The doctor's family were enrolled aith the Presby erians. The farmer's family were all in the Christian Church, and so loyal that they would not attend church anywhere else; but so disloyal that they would not attend Sunday school. It wasn't clear to the brother that a woman "had ort to run a Sunday school." But he knew good preaching; and as the preacher from forty miles away never gave them any other kind, he was there every time to hear him, and always brought his half-dollar. He was even fond of taking Brother Portly home with him to dinner.

Portly was indeed a good preacher and a good worker; and it was t rough the interest he felt in the church that the co-operation evangelist was sent to hold the meeting at Freedom. Freedom was a county seat, almet on the Onio line; and our church had existed there since the palmy das of John O'Kane and Walter Scott. But for some reason it failed to grow. It had served more as a feeder for the other churches than otherwise; and, just now, the members added by a fine meeting only last O tober were "taking membership" with the Presbyterians and Methodists. Brother Portly, who had held the meeting at air all sacrifice, was anxious to stop this disintegration and see if the Christian Church might not be made able to hold her own.

Freedom was very largely given over to the devil of infidelity. The Methodist people had a fine building, and they and the Presbyterians about equally divided the prestige of the place. But in that population of near fifteen hundred, both audiences. except on special ocrasions, would not have filled a common country meeting house. The cause of this decadence was nothing more or less than rection. Two women from Cincinnati had dropped in upon the Methodists to hold a great revival. They had succeeded in holding one, and it was truly great. Throngs of people had attended and the excitement had become so great as to unbalance a mind or two. The mourners went about the streets and the women brought down so much of the power of God that one of them declared she saw Jesus coming down the aisle. She bounced up and down in her chair as she said this, and ex horted sinners to "seize him and h ld him fast," and not to "let him go" till they "forced him to impart a bessing." Unaccountable as it may seem, this whirlwind of exci ement caught away the judgment of people who really knew better; and two hundred and fifty-two "from all the churches" were reported in the papers as having been thus powerfully converted. The coller sense of the managers waited for the six months of probatio before enrolling their names. and when that period had passed they found seventeen to be add-d to th ir membership!

Where were the two hu dred and thirty-five? Most of the a had cooled down and when they found no reality in their paroxysm of religious fervor, they supposed no reality to exist in religion, and had become infidels. So, now, Paul was in a field white for the harvest, and yet, having so dead a force to aid him, the outlook was far from flattering.

the Sunday morning service was well attended. Portly himself could not be there on account of an engagement elsewhere. But Paul felt no embarrassment in introducing himself; and as he proceeded in the discussion of the text: "I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified," he saw two or three wiping their eyes and felt the full force of a solemn occasion.

Noticing that the singing was almost wholly carried along by the young girls, and that a good leader would be of great service, he announced that he would write for a man to come over and help them.

Timothy came in answer to Paul's letter; and at once the singing improved. So, too, day meetings were established and a deep and wholesome sentiment pervaded the church. But this narrative is more concerned with Timothy than with the meeting. Uncle Reuben opened his home to receive the junior worker and now began the best part of his acquaintance with his senior. He related the hateful features of his Sunrise experience, and took Paul into full confidence. They talked, they studied, they read books, they prepared sermons together; and every day they walked out among the factories to see the men and invite them to the meetings.

By this joint work they continued to have a houseful. Paul preached of nights and Timothy sang; Timothy preached in the day meetings and all the people shook hands.

Things were thus moving pleasantly along, when one day Brother Fussy told Paul he had a letter from his sister in Sunrise. The letter warned him against affiliating with Timothy Henry. She was well acquainted with his mother-in-law and the widow had told her some awful things about him; repeating, in fact, the things that had tortured him at Homo and Luzon.

Paul's accidental acquaintance with the facts of the committee's investigation satisfied Brother Fussy and he wrote the facts to his sister; but Paul thought it best to advise the persecuted young man of what he had heard, and thus provide a means of ending it.

So when they were seated for their usual evening talk, Paul said: "Brother Henry, I heard from the River to-day." The boy turned pale and then flushed. "And what did you hear?" said he.

"Your mother-in-law is still maligning you, and something must be done. Tell me, as one answering to God, are you innocent?"

"Before God, I am; except the one sin against Brother Norris!"

"Well, then, sit down and write a letter to the Sunrise Blade; acknowledge what you have done that is wrong and emphatically deny what is false."

The Prize Poem.

As announced, the vote for the prize poem on "Macatawa" closed December 13. While the vote was not large compared with the registration (which included the entire subscription list of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST), the voters were thoroughly representative and were numerous enough to make a quorum. Fifty six per cent. of all the votes cast were in favor of the third poem, which should have been designated by "C." It had been our expectation to announce the name of the victor, but he, with a modesty so rare in the genus irritabile of poets that we shrink from discouraging it, requests that his identity be not dis-We therefore take pleasure in awarding the honor and the prize to the author of the unsigned poem whom we will designate as The Great Unknown. Who knows but that it may be old Anonymous himself, whose familiar name is appended to many of the best things in every collection of poetry?

Armenian Christmas Customs.

In Erzerum, Armenia, Christmas tide is the season when the maidens fancy they can choose the love of their dreams, and they have a unique way of getting the question decided. In the early morning, before sunrise, the maiden makes a corn cake. While it is in the oven, she dresses herself in her prettiest costume, for this is an offering to fate and she must look her best. When the cake is done, the maiden bears it to the roof where she places it on the terraced housetop, then hides herself behind the great chimney. Suddenly there comes a whir of wings, and she sees a great bird looking toward the cake. Finally he swoops down in swift flight and seizes the maiden's offering to fate. This is the supreme moment. The girl's eyes never waver a moment in watching the bird's flight, for where he rests will be her future mate, if she chooses to have him. If the bird flies far away her fate will not be settled during the coming year .-Chautauquan.

While the promise of Scripture, as a last resort, is often heard about "two or three gathered together in God's name," the church is run on the working conviction that unless the minister and the elders can gather two or three hundred in God's name, He will not pay any particular attention to them, or if He does, He will not pay the bills. The church of our forefathers, founded on personality, is exchanged for the church of democracy, founded on crowds; and the church of the moment is the institutional church, in which the standing of the clergyman is exchanged for the standing of the congregation. The inevitable result, the crowd clergyman, is seen on every hand amongst us,-the agent of an audience, who, instead of telling an audience what they ought to do, runs errands for them morning and noon and night. With coddling for majorities and tact for whims, he carefully picks his way. He does his people as much good as they will let him, tells

The Line Fence.

A good lawyer learns many lessons in the school of human nature; and thus it was that lawyer Hackett did not fear to purchase the tract of land which had been "lawed over" for years.

Some of the people wondered why he wanted to get hold of the property with such an incubus of uncertainty upon it. Others thought that perhaps he wanted some legal knitting-work, and would pitch in red hot to fight that line-fence question on his own hook. That's what the owner of the adjoining land thought. So he braced himself for trouble when he saw Hackett coming across the fields one day.

Said Hackett: "What's your claim here, anyway, as to this fence?"

"I insist," replied the neighbor, "that your fence is over on my land two feet at one end and one foot at least at the other end."

"Well," replied Hackett, "you go ahead, just as quick as you can, and set the fence over. At the end where you say I encroach on your two feet, set the fence on my land four feet. At the other end, push it on my land two feet."

"But," persisted the neighbor, "that is twice what I claim."

"I don't care about that," said Hackett. "There's been fight enough over this land. I want you to take enough so you are perfectly satisfied, and then we can get along pleasantly. Go ahead and help yourself."

The man paused, abashed. He had been ready to commence the old struggle, tooth and nail, but this move of the new neighbor stunned him. Yet he wasn't to be outdone in generosity. He looked at Hackett.

'Squire," said he, "that fence ain't going to be moved an inch. I don't want the land. There wasn't nothin' in the fight, anyway, but the principle of the thing."-The Watchword.

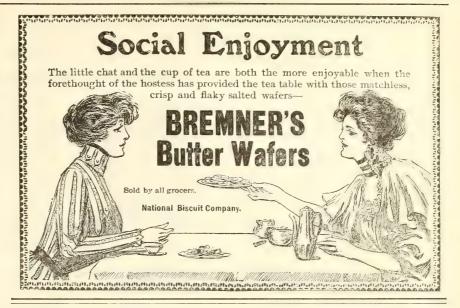

Advance Society Letters.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

Jas. T. Trellow, New York City: "My aunt from Ohio has just come to spend the winter with us, and she brought a great big trunk that was just full of things. I don't mean her particular trunk, but an old leather one that she told us children to rummage in as much as we wanted. I'am 13. So we rummaged, and one day I found a big pile of papers in a corner and they were Christian-Evangelists, with your page in the end part. So I read the Red Box Clew, and I tell you it was fine. You ought to have seen me digging into those papers up in our attic. I like the children's letters pretty well, and I want someone to answer this: Whoever has read a Rollo Book? Also, who is going to read Louisa Alcott's letters that will come out next year in the Ladies' Home Journal? I am. And I am reading 'Pete.' I can tell you who the tramp is. He is the man that married Edgar Brown's sweetheart, I mean Mr. Hardcattle. Afterwards the tramp will die and then Edgar can marry that girl he was so taken up with." Margaret E. Sturges, Chillicothe, Mo.: "I have been reading about the Advance Society ever since it was organized and wanted to join, but just neglected it. I think the Red Box Clew was just a fine story, I enjoyed it very much. 'Pete' is a good story also. I have one objection to your stories-you never have enough in a paper. I think Pete a 'cute' little girl, and I know who put those lemondrops in the girls' boxes. My favorite books are: Ivanhoe, David Copperfield, Little Men, Little Women, I am 14, I am reading of the French Revolution." Delight M. Shafer, Decatur, Tex.: "My Advance Society work has been a failure in the past quarter. I have read some in McCarthy's History of Our Own Times, the Saturday Evening Post, etc., and learned a few quotations, but domestic affairs have interfered with regular study. I begin a better record to-day." Madge Masters, Ozark, Ark.: "How we dig sweet potatoes: We commenced Oct 16th. One man plows out the potatoes with a turning-plow, then some of the rest come along on their hands and knees and scratch out the potatoes; some more come along with potato-boxes and gather the largest up and put them in the boxes; then some one else comes along and gathers up the small ones (or seed potatoes as we call them). The boxes hold one bushel. They are two feet long, divided in the middle. They fill a wagon with the boxes and take them to the cellar and unload in birs about three feet deep. Of 75 acres of sweet potatoes planted last summer they have put 14,000 bushels in the cellars. They pay the men 12 cents an hour." Harry Cash, Pennville, Ind.: "My eighth report was not printed in the honor list. I expect it was sent to Plattsburg and you didn't get it. I am very much interested in the story 'Pete.'" Mattie Upton, Houstonia, Mo.: "I thought I would write you a few lines. How are you liking the place where you live now? I have read the Blue Veil, Jess, Ten Nights in a Bar-room. My favorite quotation is from Sir Walter Scott. I like the continued story. I think Pete's and Madge's mother knew the tramp bofore she was married." Mary Emily Day, Sparta, Mo.: "I live on a farm three miles from Sparta, where I attend church when the weather permits. We have been very busy gathering in the golden grain and the big red apples, but now as the work is nearly done I hope to have more time to read. I have made an Advance Society badge of blue worked in gold, and I wear it wherever I go. I like 'Pete' very much and think Nap (the tramp) is Mrs. Morris' brother." Jennie Turner, St. Paul, Minn .: "I do like that young man, Mr. Edgar Brown, in your story of 'Pete.' I wish I could meet some one just like him. Wasn't Pete brave to go up in that loft and talk to the tramp? I expect he wasn't as bad as he was painted. I am a little orphan living with such a good lady, but she is not well off, and don't you think somebody sends the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to me each week after they have read it, and I don't know who, but I want to thank them right here! I wonder if they saw me some place, and liked my face and remembered me? Because, how could they know about me? And I am only twelve. Once I knew a long poem, but I have forgotten all but the start. Can somebody tell me who wrote it, so I will know where to hunt it up and find it again? It was real funny. It began this way:

"'Tim Turpin was blind and ne'er had seen the skies, For Nature, when his head was made, forgot to dot his eyes.

So like a poor school-teacher, Tim was forced to do,—
Look out for pupils, for he had a vacancy for two.'"

Lulu Coleman, Spurgeon, Ind.: "I have been reading the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a long time and I want to join the Advance Society. Tell me how and what to do. I would like to know your name."

Honor List: Madge Masters (8th quarter); Mary Emily Day (3rd); Harry Cash (9th); Mattie Upton (7th).

Children, this is the last chance I will have to say a word to you before Christmas, that day for which it seems the other days of the year were made. So I will answer some questions and make a few remarks. I, for one, have read many Rollo Books. If anybody else has had this pleasure, hold up your hands. There is much difference of opinion concerning Nap. I am afraid one tramp won't be able to go all around. Has anybody else a guess as to who he is? If anybody can guess who Nap is, before it is told in the story (and that will be a long time off), I will send that person, free of charge, a copy of my historical novel, Shem, which the Christian Publishing Company has just published. Everybody take notice of this prize-offer. The solution of the mystery will not appear until next May, for this is a very long story. If more than one person guesses it correctly, the book goes to that one whose guess comes first to my letter box. I don't care who guesses, or how many in the same family guess; but nobody can have more than one guess. Since you didn't know about this before (in fact, I have just thought of it) I will not count the guesses that have already been made. We will begin on Christmas day. In the meantime, can anybody tell who wrote the poem Jennie Turner quotes? I am 'liking the place where I live now' a good deal. Don't forget it is Albany, Mo., and that my address is Central Christian College. Mary Emily Day is not the only one who wears our badge. Notice our letters this week; although there are but nine, they represent six different states. What is my name? Why, look at the top of the page. That's it, my sure-enough name that my papa and mamma gave me when I was little. Did anybody think that was 'a made up, make-believe name? No, indeed! How join the Av. S.? Make five resolutions: to read five pages of history and thirty lines of poetry, and memorize a quotation from a good author every week, read a Bible verse each day, and keep an account in a note-book. Is there anybody else doesn't know yet? A merry Christmas, and a stockknow yet? ing full of kind wishes to all of you! Albany, Mo.

FOURTH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

The lessons we have been studying for the past three months have led us in the Master's footsteps, as he traversed the province of Perea, east of the Jordan, until his final journey to Jerusalem, whose immediate vicinity he left no more till he departed by way of the cross But a few days yet lie between him and Calvary; but so many are the great events that cluster about that supreme tragedy that we shall study for six months to come the life of Jesus during the weeks that preceded and followed his sublime act of sacrifice.

The Perean ministry of the Master was a busy and toilsome one. The throng about him grew daily larger, the enthusiasm of the multitude more outspoken, and the enmity of the Pharisees and scribes more bitter. The first two lessons of the quarter, Jesus Dining with a Pharisee and the parable of the Great Supper, were directed towards the legalism, pride and carnality of the spiritual leaders. They made the Sabbath a burden instead of a blessing to the people, sought worldly honors rather than godly service; and were so absorbed with the claims of mammon as to reject the divine invitation to eternal bliss.

The next two lessons comprise the three "parables of grace," by which Jesus made known the heart of God, in its yearning for the salvation of sinful man; and, at the same time, reveal-d the selfish and bigoted spirit of the Pharisees and scribes, who would rather that men should go to perdition than that they should have the Hand of Infinite Love extended to them. Not one of them would rail at the shepherd who went out on the bleak hills to find his straying sheep; nor chide the housewife who swept her house diligently to find the one lost coin. Much less would they mock the love of the father who with open arms welcomed home his prodigal son. Yet they were murmuring at Jesus, when he came seeking and saving the lost. All their self-righteousness was unavailing to atone for such unholy envy; and the angels of God joined with the Father himself in rejoicing more over the turning of one sinner to righteousness than over ninety and nine who rested complacently in their fancied freedom from the guilt of transgression.

The next two lessons contain a severe rebuke to those who wrongly use the means and opportunities of life, which might be made to minister to human need on earth, and to fulness of joy in heaven. By the parable of the Unjust Steward, the Master taught us that a wise use of wealth, or other agency of benefactions, would ensure to us a future of undimmed glory and satisfaction. Even the unrighteous s-rvant, by his worldly wisdom, secured for himself a shelter beneath the roofs of those whom he had profited by his knavery. Mach more may we, if we use honestly and generously the things committed to us, anticipate a welcome into the home of righteousness. But if, like the rich man in the second parable, we allow the poor saint to suffer at our door, while we revel in luxury, we may expect, in the next world, to be shut out from the joys that come to those who patiently suffer and trust. They shall rest in Paradise while we behold their bliss from afar off.

In the story of the Ten Lepers Cleansed, we are reminded of the common sin of ingratitude, which so cruelly wounds the leving heart of the great Giver of good. Of the ten who were healed but one came back to render thanks for his restoration from the dread disease. The others were too eager to secure their certificates from the priest, and get back again into the great and busy world from which their affliction had excluded them, to spend even the little time needed to return and fall at the feet of their benefactor. The grateful heart, like the garden after rain, will blossom into bright and fragrant thanksgiving.

On the Sunday before Thanksgiving, known as Temperance Sunday, we turned aside to study one of the practical lessons on self-control, which occur so frequently in the Scriptures. Sobriety, charity, sincerity, such are the virtues that hallow the home life and elevate society. The aged men and women are to teach their juniors, by word and example, and the young are to make their very youth honorable by keeping it pure and unselfish. God's grace has brought salvation to men, making it possible for them to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, and to anticipate the coming of Jesus Christ in glory, and with reward.

Lesson IX, the Rich Young Ruler, conveys a warning much needed in this day of rapid wealthgetting Many who are hastening to get rich do not realize that they are falling into a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lasts, such as drown men in destruction and perdition. They forget that the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil, and that they that trust in riches cannot enter into the kingdom of Gad. Sadly would they turn away from Jesus, should he make upon them the demand that proved too hard for the rich Jewish ruler. And we who have but little may, on our part, love that little to such a degree, and so envy those who have more, as to make it impossible for us to acquire the true riches, which never fail.

L-sso s X and XI are located at Jericho, and mark the turning of Jesus' way from the Jordan to Jerusalem. To the pitiful appeal of Bartimæus the unfeeling multitude returned only a rude rebuke, bidding him keep still, lest he disturb the discourse or conversation of the famous Rabbi of Nazareth. But his need was so great, and his faith so strong, that he would not hold his peace; and the prayer of faith was answered, and the Son of David gave him the blessed boon of sight.

And while in Jericho, Jesus sought not the home of the leading priest or scribe, but asked that he might lodge with one who was hated and counted an outcast from his own people, Z.c. haus, the publican. Whatever his enemies might say, or his friends think, Jesus would not turn aside from his supreme mission, to seek and save the lost. Into that home, shunned by the populace and despised by the leaders of the people, the Lord of live entered, and found there a heart that only needed the touch of kindness to break into streams of penitence and charity.

It is fitting that this wonderful century, which has drawn to the study of Him whom our Christian era enthrones the hearts of countless millions of earth's peoples, should have as its closing lesson that of the marvelous nativity of the world's Savior. So we gather about the Babe of Bethlehem. as we did in our first lesson for the year 1900, and with the Wise Men from the East lay our offerings at His feet. Blessed Bane, over whose advent the angels sang to the humble shepherds, whose star led the sig s from their distant home to keel at thy feet, whose birthday became the parting of the paths of human history and the beginning of the world's largest hope, may thy sweet spirit find a bome within our hearts, and thy dear feet mark for us life's highway of holy and happy living!

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 30.

THE OLD AND NEW: YOUR PURPOSES.

(Loke 5:36-39: Matt. 13:51, 52.)

There are some old things worth cherisbing, as old wine, old pictures, old friends, old virtues. Truly it is not always best to mingle old things with new and yet sometimes it is decidedly best Old pictures may go into new frames; old friends into new environment.

Is there, however, any old trait of character, any old goodness, old charm, that is struggling beneath a weight of newer weaknesses? Sometimes, old things are best. The way we used to think, to feel, to act, may sometimes be better than later ways.

N w Year's is a good time to bring from our trea-ure house things new and old and select those that are worthy to be preserved. Is is a good time to renew youth, to freshen up old feelings, and strip off new growths and excrescences.

"Backward, turn backward, O time!" If I could but know again the joy of first service, the enthusiasm of early days in the kingdom. And why not? If I could but beli-ve again as I once did, when in childish days, I thought of God, when my mother talked, as a great, good Father, like my own, only tenderer and gentler. And why not continue so to think? There is nothing in all the philosophizing, in all the modern theologies and the new criticisms, however true all of them may be, that is at war with the old simple childlike conceptions of the Father's heart, or that is superior to them in value!

/To be sure there are some old things that aree ot worth keeping. There are some old notions of things, some old practices that may not be in themselves evil, but that are not worth keeping just b cause they are old. They are the old wineskins that might as well be thrown away; they are the old garments which, though patched up for a time and made serviceable for a short day, are nevertheless doomed soon to pass. New Year's is a good time to face these things resolutely, and winnow them out and throw them away.

Are we struggling to keep any old notion of religious things, or any old narrow notion of the largeness of Christianty? Let us throw it aside, burn it up with the wornout. Are we trying to harbor any old attitude toward those about us, or toward business or moral matters, that is inconsistent with a newer, larger, more Christian life? Let us pluck it out, though dear as the hand or the eye, and throw it away.

There is a beautiful symbol that has long been in use in the church, a symbol of the separation between the old and the new, a symbol of th between the old and the new, a symbol of the burial of an old self, and a resurrection to walk in a newness of life. Shall we not think of that symbol again at New Year's? And though we have not need to repeat it outward y, shall wen t be re baptized in throwing aside the old, imper feet, halting, weaking life, and in a manly and womanly standing forth to a holier attitude?

A SOUTHERN PLANTER; Social Life in the Old South. By Susan Dabney Smedes. James Pott & Co., New York. $1.25.

The author of this volume in writing the biography of her father has done more than present the life of one man, for the individual who is the subject of her narrative was thoroughly typical of a class and she has written rather the biography of the Southern planter as a type before, during and after the war. As such it has all the human interest of a remance in which the reader's sympathies are enlisted in following the fortunes of a single character and the value of a history which presents a true generalization of the experiences of many individuals. The book should be received gladly by that large class to whom the story of the old South appeals. The illustrations are in photogravure.

Songs of all the Colleges. Hinds & Noble. New York. $1.

With certain limitations and exceptions, it is generally true that all the world loves a college student, and under no circumstances is he more amiable or more provocative of contagious geniality than when he sings. Not that his songs have much artistic merit about them, either in their rendition or in their composition, but they are the channel [through which the effervescent spirits of youth are transmitted from the undergraduate [body, to the more sober world without. This collection contains most of those so gs which occur to the ordinary mind when some one suggests that we sing "college songs" and a good many less familiar ones besides. They are good enough to be popular whenever college songs are desired and bad enough to be thoroughly comprehensible by the most unmitigated and irrepressible undergraduate.

ARABIA, THE CEADLE OF ISLAM. By Rev. S. M. Zwemer. Introduction by Rev. James S. Dennis. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago. $2.

The author of this scholarly volume has spent ten years in the Arabian peninsula and is able to incorporate into his work not only materials gleaned from many do umentary sources, but much that has come under his own observation. He is a missionary and writes from the standpoint of a missionary, but this does not mean that his work is not a scientific and scholarly production. Here, as in many other cases, the missionary has exceptional facilities for making contributions to the world's knowledge of geography and ethnology. Dr. Zwemer's interest is primarily in Arabia as a field for mission work, but in depicting this field he wisely devotes by far the greater amount of his space to a study of the geography, politics, religion and literature of the land. Altogether it is safe to say that there is no other single volume which can compare with this in giving all necessary information about this curious land and its strange

EXPANSION UNDER NEW WORLD CONDITIONS. By Josiah Strong The Baker & Taylor Co., New York. $1.

As a master of the art of making figures eloquent and convincing, Dr. Strong not only has no superior but really no serious rival in this country. The author believes in expansion. He believes in it because the development of commerce points to it as necessary, because the development of international politics shows it to be expedient and because the development of civil zation points to it as a duty. [He lays emphasis upon the moral obligation involved, but shows that the moral obligation grows out of political and economic conditions which point to this as "manifest destiny." The chapter titles will prove suggestive: Exhaustion of our Arable Public Lands; Our New Manufacturing Supremacy; Foreign Markets, a new Necessity; The New China; The New Isthmian Canal; The New Mediterranean; The New Mediterranean an Anglo-Saxon Sea; A New World Life; A New World Policy. To review such a book adequately would demand a series of articles upon the leading public questions of the day. This being impossible, we will say of this book more forcibly than it would be possible to say of any other recent book on public questions, that the only thing to do with it is to read it.

Home Folks. By James Whitcomb Riley. The Bowen-Merrill Co. Indianapolis.

A volume of new poems by Mr. Riley could not appear at a more appropriate time than just before Christmas. The verses which are here collected under the title "Home Folks" exhibit perhaps more versatility than has been shown in any of his other books. Of course, Mr. Riley is not pre-eminently the man for versatility. He sings of the good old times of the "airly days" and of the joy and love and tender pathos of the pres ent, in those humble walks of life where men and women keep their hearts pure and their manners plain and live their unvarnished lives frankly and heartily in the presence of their neighbors is the prevailing tone of this volume, as its name indicates. But there is also rather a larger proportion than usual of verses pitched in a higher key and written in pure English instead of Hoosier dialect. In poems such as those on Emerson, Eugene Field and Lincoln, we have strong thought and strong poetry-stronger, perhaps, than even Mr. Rilev's old admirers knew that he was capable of in this style. In his "Lines to Robert Louis Stevenson" the Hoosier makes a bold attempt to express himself in the low-Scotch dialect. It is interesting and withal good-for a Hoosier. may be admitted at least that he imitates the burr of the Lowlands better than any Scotchman from Burns to Stevenson would be likely to reproduce the up-country twang of Indiana.

THE LIFE OF CHRIST. A Poem, by the Rev. Samuel Wesley, Vicar of Epworth. Union Book Co., Chicago.

The world had almost forgotten that Samuel Wesley, father of the illustrious John and Charles Wesley and vicar of the historic Epworth parish in England, was the author of a massive and monumental epic poem dealing with the life of Christ. Two conturies ago it was written, found immediate recognition by the best critics of that day and was magnificently published under the patronage of William III, who rewarded the author for his poetic accomplishment by the gift of the vicarage at Epworth. A century later when it had gone out of print and been forgotten it was rediscovered, revised and republished by Bishop Coke, the first Methodist bishop ordained by John Wesley. Again it dropped into oblivion from which it is now a second time rescued by the editorship of Edward T. Roe. It is a massive work in ten books and containing approximately fifteen thousand lines, and there are few incidents in the life of Christ which are not treated in it at length. The poetic style is such as would be expected of its age and author. There is much dignity but little inspiration in it. The opening lines are perhaps as fair a sample as can be found anywhere:

"I sing the God who, though enthroned on high,
In human nature deigned to live and die:
I sing the God each modest serath sings,
The most afflicted, yet the best of kings;
Him, who from heaven to earth's vile shores came down.

Without his sceptre, diadem, or crown, To banish Satan to the flames below, And rescue nortals from impending woe. Pain marked his *teps in his incarnate state, But godlike patience made him truly great."

This is not great poetry, but it is thoroughly respectable. It lacks only a little indefinable something to make it Miltonic, but that something was what made Milton a master and the absence of it leaves Samuel Weeley a first-rate poetizer rather than a first-grade poet. The danger of the style is its tendency to lapse into bombast whenever it misses its intended grandeur. However, there is so much worse poetry that has so much greater reputation, that we can hope for this work by the grandfather of Methodism a wider reading than it has yet had and more adequate recognition than has been accorded to it since the days when it won for its author the vicarage which became, in a sense, the home of his son's great religious movement.

A HISTORY OF AMERICAN LITERATURE. By Walter C. Bronson, Professor of English Literature in Brown University. D. C. Heath & Co. Boston. Pp. 374. $80.

Writing with the original purpose of making a text-book for schools and colleges, Professor Bronson has produced a readable and meaty little volume which will be of service to any one who desires a brief survey of the literary history of America. A pre-eminent characteristic of the volume is its usableness. It is at once devoid of unprofitable padding and untouched by the dryness which is inseparable from a mere syllabus. The obscure literary history of the colonial period is well treated and is further illuminated by an appendix of extracts from the less accessible works of that time. The notices of many of the later writers, while appreciative appear somewhat meagre. Sidney Lanier might well have received more extended treatment and one would be glad to see more than two lines devoted to the work of Charles Dudley Warner. But this is a defect which is perhaps inseparable from any attempt to crowd a history of American literature into so small a compass. In dealing with the crowded ranks of contemporary writers, details are necessarily omitted and a sentence of usually just characterization is given to each. The book is contemporaneous enough to include Paul Laurence Dunbar and Winston Churchill. Bibliographies, reference lists and chronological tables increase the usefulness of the volume.

A Winning Boy.

EARNS HIS MEDALS BY THE USE OF GOOD FOOD.

A Vicksburg, Miss., boy, J. B. Smith, corner Grove and Third streets, bays: "I have been studying very hard to try and beat my room in examination. I have been eating catmeal and cresm for breakfast all my life. Lately when the hard study began I did not feel well enough to go to school, and there was an examination shead of me and an exhibition, too.

"I was determined to go through this examination, but felt so sick all the time that I didn't know how to accomplish it. Well, mother saw the Grape-Nuts food advertised, so she bought some and gave it to me for breakfast every morning, and you just ought to see what this food did for

"I began to get well at once and grow hearty and fat, in spite of my hard work. Above all that I did beat my room at examination, making a general average that was the highest mark in the room. I am also able to take part at the military drill to-morrow night at the exhibition and will try for the gold medal for general excellence. If you think there is any question about this you can write Bro. Gabrial, our principal, and he will tell you that it is true."

It is of the greatest importance that parents feed their growing children, during study, on the most nourishing food possible to obtain, and there is no question on this score regarding Graps Nuts, for the food is compounded of the elements selected from the grains which go to quickly make and rebuild the brain and nerve centers. Any parent can prove this statement by feeding the children on Grape-Nuts. Obtained from any first class

BOSWORTH.

When, in St. Authony's hospital, Columbus O ... cancer caused the death of Charlotte C. B sworth Nov. 2, 1900, there departed from earth one of the "chief women." Sie was of the chief women because possessed of the qualities of heart which because possessed of the qualities of heart which constitute true nobility, the character which reveals the "divine na'ure." She was the daughter of Edward and Sarah Pettit; she remembered her Creator in her youth, having surrendered her life to Jesus at 13 yearsof age. She found His service one of great juy as well as a school in which to one of great juy as well as a school in which to learn the mind of the Master, cultivate the fruit of the Spirit, and grow into the divine likeness. The world knows her best as a preacher's wife and Christian worker. She was married in 1868 to E. A. Bosworth, to whose pastoral work she was an able and acceptable second on the Western Reserve, in Sharon and Braddock, Pa., Steubenville, Akron, Flushing and Morris' own, Ohio. Richm nd, Mo, and Savannah, Ga. As teacher in Sunday-school, worker in Aid Societies, C. E, B. W B. M. and all other departments of church work-

None knew her but to love her, Nornamed her but to praise.

As a home-maker and companion for her husband, a supplement in life and labor to his character and work; as an incentive and inspiration to greater effort and larger, richer life; as a friend to the needy, visitor to the sick, a loving sister to the whole community, a peace-maker and comforter in time of trouble, she was the counterpart of the "virtuous woman" of the Proverbs, and more than that in some particulars, for she brought to her work a character which is the product of union with Christ, a source of power unknown in earlier dispensations. She had no children after the flesh but is mother of a host after the Spirit, for in loving travail of the Sunday-school and personal contact she brought them forth after the Holy Spirit had begotten them through her character and the word which she taught. These babes she faithfully fed on the pure milk of the word, and, as they could endure it, on the strong meat, but gave to all the Bread of Life and sought to bring them to the fullness of the measure of the stature of Christ. In her home life she was seen at her best. "A world of love shut in," and a "home, sweet home," she made. Putting her soul into the task she made the home a paradise for her husband, and like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, as well as a delight and solace to the guest and casual caller. The man in quest of a working model for a Christian home need seek no further when once he had seen the home she made. So deaying to self and studious of others' comfort was she that she even hid her intense suffering from her husband lest it should cause him pain. Her husband, brother and three sisters who re-main, together with a wide circle of friends, feel-a void in their hearts and feel earth to be the poorer since her departure; but because her path was that of the just which shineth more and more until the perfect day, we are assured that she who walked with God in this life still walks with him where the eternal morning has dawned and the shalows have fled away. The remains were laid away at Alliance, O., Nov. 4, 1900. Blessing is hers, for she died in the Lord and her works follow her.

SINCLAIR.

David Sinclair was born in New York City Feb ruary 4, 1866, and fell asleep in Jesus at Central City. Col November 25, 1900. His parents were early Disciples of Christ in New York. His father died in 1868; his mother thirty years later. David was brought up in the faith of the gospel. David was bought up in the faith of the gospel. When Wayland Johnson was pastor of the church on 169th street, in 1884, the congregation of which S. T. Willis's now pastor, David, and his only brother, William, openly confessed Christ and united with the church. Both became active and efficient in Christiam work. Miss Mabel Estelle Van Buren became the wife of David Sin-clair March 6, 1889. Their union was unusually happy. She remains to mournfully cherish the memory of her noble husband, and to train their only child. a bright and beautiful baby boy, in the fear of the Lord. In July, 1891, Mr. and Mrs Sinclair removed from New York to Idaho. They settled for a time in the famous Payette valley; later living in Boise and Silver City. Brother Sinclair was a total abstainer and an active third party prohibitionist. He was also an enthusiastic Christian Endeavorer. When he lived in Boi-e he was at the same time President of the End avor Society in the Christian Church, President of the Boise City Endeavor Union, and President of the Idaho State Union. President Clark, of the United Society of Christian Endeavor. was his personal friend. The integrity and uprightness of his daily life caused David Sinclair to be admired, trosted, and even loved by those from whom he differed most widely in sentiment and conduct. He was a Christly man. Last January Brother Sinclair came to Central City, Col., forty miles from Denver, to take a responsible business position. The testivony of the Rev Alex. MacKay, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, in Central City, at his funeral, was that Mr. David Sinclair, during his residence in that community, had walked in a Christian manner. Somettime before he left Idaho his health was seriously impaired. For almost a year and a half he was a sick man He did not complain. Only his most intimate friends knew of his suffering. Seventeen months ago he came under the knife of the surgeon for appendicitis. under the knife of the surgeon for appendicitis. David Sinclair was born on Sunday, confessed Christ on Sunday, was operated on on Sunday, and in the afternoon of a bright Lord's day he went home to glory. His brother named above, remains in Central City. His sisters, Mrs. Henry Schell Sobingiar, and Miss Nellie C Sinclair, live in New York. The news of David Sinclair's death will bring grief to many hearts, but his friends and kinspeople do not mourn as do those who have no hope. He believed in God and in Jesus Christ, our Lord. THE HEALTH HABIT

Just as Easy to Form as Any Other.

We do not deliberately form our pet habits, but they are unconsciously acquired and grow as we grow, and by the time we learn they are hurting us, we flad them too strong to be easily broken

Then, why not form a good habit, a habit which will counteract the many bad ones, in other words contract the unfashionable habit of being always

The best health habit to get into is to have and keep a vigo: ous stemach; if you have a healthy di-gestion you can drink your beloved coff e, smoke your favorite brand of tobacco, with little or no harm; the mischief begins when these things are forced upon the faithful stomach, without any assistance.

Form the habit of taking after meals some harmless but efficient digestive which will relieve the stomach of so much extra work.

Nature furnishes us with such digestives and when they are combined with such a pleasant preparation as Stua t's Dyspesia Tablets, they give the overworked stomach just the necessary assistance to secure perfect digestion without any of the harmful effects of cathartics and similar drugs.

The habit of taking Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after meals is as necessary to the weak stomach as after meals is a snecessary to the weak stomach as food itself, and indeed to get the benefit from food eaten, nothing better and certainly nothing safer can be u · d.

Many families consider Stuart's Tablets as essential in the house as knives and forks.

They consist entirely of natural digestive principle without the effect or characteristics of drugs; they have no catbartic action, but simply go to work on the food eaten ard digest it.

Take into account your bad habits and the expense they entail and then invest fifty cents i a box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets and see if your digestion for the next month is not vastly improved.

Ask the clerk in any drug store the name of the most successful and popular stomach remedy and he will say Stuart's.

Book Notes.

On page 1615 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, under the heat of "A New D parture," is set forth at length our plan of per nitting our patrons to purchase books on the instalment plan. We believe that this is the best move we have made in pursuance of our general purpose of making it easy for people to provide themselves with good literature. It will enable many a preacher to fill up the empty places on his bookshelves, and secure the volumes which he needs and has long coveted. It is hard to pay out $10 or $15 or $25 all at once for a lot of books, and it is almost as hard for the man with a small income to save up that amount. It is an easy thing, however, for him to make a payment of $2 or $3 every month. He hardly feels such small payments, and after a few months, during which he has had the use of the books, they are his own.

No family should be without a first-class, unabridged dictionary, especially now that one can be secured so cheaply. The intending purchaser of a dictionary should be wary, however. Ho will likely see advertised "---- Unabridged Dictionary, Only Two Dollars." This is a delusion and a snare. If he bites at the bait and send his $2, he will get an "unabridged dictionary," all right, but after he has examined it, he will be glad to sell it for fifty cents, for he will find it to bo but a reprint of an edition published about 1835 and practically valu-less at the present time. The best dictionary of which we know is the Standard Dictionary. It is the latest and best lexicon of our language. We offer this work, complete in two volumes, bound in full morocco or full Russia, for Thirteen Dollars. The regular price is Twenty-six Dollars. The purchaser who takes advantage of our instalment plan can secure it by paying $3 down, and $2 per month for five months.

To the preacher who needs more books and intends taking advantage of our instalment plan, we suggest the set of "Alexander Campbell's Works." This set contains two volumes bound in leather, six bound in cloth and three pamphlets. The price is $8. Add to this Grafton's "Life of Alexander Campbell" and Garrison's "Alexander Campbell's Theology," and the order amounts to just $10, which is the minimum order to which the instalment plan applies. All these books may be secured by the payment of $2 down (on receipt of which we immediately forward the books) and $2 per month for four months.

If you desire to purchase books amounting to $10 or over, and do not wish to pay cash down, write and tell us what books you wish. We will fill out an agreement for you to sign. When you receive the agreement, you may, if you like the terms offered, sign it and return it with the first payment, whereupon we will ship you the books. If you do not like the terms, you can destroy the agreement, and that en's it. No harm is done. It will indeed be surprising if we do not immediately hear from hundreds of our read-rs and patrons who wish to take advantage of our liberal offer.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Hay Pauncefote treaty with its amendments has been ratified by the Senate, by a vote of 55 to 18. By far the most important of the amendments was that of Senator Davis, which has already been reported. This, together with Senator Lodge's amendment by which this treaty was made definitely to supercede the Clayton-Bulwer convention, alters the purport of the treaty so materially that those who are responsible for it may feel justified in considering their policy rebuked. Although the document bears the name of Secretary Hay, the President has lately declared that the real responsibility for it rests chiefly with himself, and the adoption of the amended treaty is a clear statement that the Senate does not confirm his judgment as to the conditions upon which our government is willing to build the canal. It has taken the United States a year to amend and ratify the treaty. It is now Great Britain's turn to deal with it as amended. There is not even any rumor worth repeating as to the probable course which the British government will pursue, or the length of time which it will take to reach a conclusion. If the canal bill is postponed until the British ratification of the treaty is received, it will probably not be passed at the present session.

During the past week the United States Supreme Court has been hearing arguments on two test cases to determine whether or not the Philippines and Porto Rico are in the fullest sense parts of the United States. The question directly involved is the constitutionality of the tariff on articles imported into the United States from these islands; and the larger question back of that is whether or not the constitution follows the flag and annexation in itself confers citizenship. Attorney-General Griggs has taken an active part in arguing the case for the United States, i. e., in support of the view assumed by Congress when it passed the Porto Rican tariff bill, the constitutionality of which is now in question. The case is one of great importance and interest and an adverse decision by the Supreme Court will necessitate some alterations in our policy toward these possessions. It does not appear, however, that the anti-expansionists have in any case anything to gain by the decision of the court. If the court affirms the constitutionality of the Porto Rican tariff law, then their contention that Congress cannot govern territory independently of the constitution will be rebuked by the highest authority in the land. If, on the other hand, as they hope, the court declares that the law is unconstitutional and that the annexation of these islands has conferred upon their inhabitants citizenship and all the rights of citizenship, including the rights of free trade with all other parts of the United States, then there must be an end to their appeals for independence for the Philippines and Porto Rico. It has already been decided at the cost of much blood and treasure that no body of citizens of the United States has a right to secede and establish an independent government. The civil war decided that government with the consent of the governed did not include the right of secession. If the Filipinos have the right of citizenship, they have also the duties, including loyalty to the federal government. So, whatever the decision of the Supreme Court may be, there can be little in it to comfort those who favor independence for the inhabitants of our new possessions. So far as the decision of the court can go, we have a right either to govern them without the constitution or to insist that they shall submit to the constitution.

The brewers seem to be in a fair way to achieve a notable defeat in their efforts to secure a reduction in the tax on beer. Their lobby has long ago given up all hope of getting a favorable recommendation from the House Committee on Ways and Means and it has now become discouraged with the chances of doing anything at all with the House and has transferred the scene of its labors to the Senate wing of the capitol. Here, too, the chances are not bright, although several members of the Senate committee are in favor of a larger total the $40,000,000 recreduction than ommended by the House committee. Senator Aldrich, who is chairman of the committee, has declared unequivocally that there is to be no political debt-paying in this transaction and that if the brewers expect to have their tax decreased they must produce some more valid argument than that of campaign services. The brewers claim that the increase of the tax from one dollar to two dollars a barrel was made explicitly as a war measure and that now, since the war has been officially declared to be at an end, it should be removed. This would be plausible enough as an argument for doing away with all the special war taxes, if the extra expenses which grew out of the war had stopped with the war itself. That this was not the case is sufficiently evident from the fact that it has appeared evident to those in a position to know best that little more than one-third of the war tax can be removed. The two houses of Congress and the administration are not so thoroughly "in the grip of the liquor power" as some of our reformers would have us believe. The brewers will have to take their chances with the other industries in the tax reduction.

The Army Bill with its anti-canteen amendment, which passed the House by such a large majority, may be held up in the Senate. The anti-canteen feature has already had one modification suggested which has received the approval of the Senate committee. It is proposed that the prohibition extend only to the selling of wines and distilled liquors. This would leave the way open for the selling of beer in the canteen. The most that can be said for this modification is that is a doubtful improvement on the present canteen system. It won't do. The action of the House of Representatives shows clearly enough that the people want a thorough-going anti-canteen law and that the Congressmen know that the people want it. Many members of the House of Representatives in explaining their votes stated that, while they personally had no confidence in the anti canteen measure as a means of insuring sobriety in the army, they recognized that their constituents believed in it and they were willing to give it a trial. Unfortunately the Senators are not so directly in touch with their constituents and are less forcibly influenced by expressions of public opinion. Still, even the Senate cannot safely disregard the wishes of the people wno elect Legislatures. It may be worth while, if you have decided opinions on the canteen question, to let the Senators from your state know them.

The situation in South Africa has become still more serious during the past week and any resemblance to guerrilla warfare which the operations of the Boers may hitherto have borne has disappeared. General Roberts' timely arrival on the field of action about a year ago added vastly to his reputation, and it may be that his equally timely departure will contribute toward keeping unblemished his reputation for invincibility. Of course the ultimate outcome is no more doubtful now than it has been at any stage of the war, for even in the darkest days of the siege of Ladysmith the crushing of the Boers could only be regarded as a question of time. But it appears that it is still a matter of more time-and more money. Kitchener still calls for more cavalry. His infantry is too slow to cope with so shifty an enemy. Gen. Knox was forced to abandon the pursuit of De Wet and the escape of that wily Boer from so tight a pen must be regarded as one of the most brilliant episodes in modern military history. The division of De Wet's army into three columns was at first considered a successful bit of British strategy, but it turns out to be a shrewd trick by which one of these columns leads the enemy astray, while the other two effect an invasion of Cape Colony. Colesburg is reported to be in the hands of the Boers and the disaffection of the Cape Colony Dutch makes the invasion easier. Kitchener reports that, so far as he can determine. the invasion of Cape Colony has been checked, but he speaks with no great confidence. Last Christmas was a time of bitter sorrow in England, and this year there is no occasion for any great outburst of triumphant joy.

After many delays, the joint note of the Powers addressed to the Chinese government has been signed by all the representatives and delivered to Li Hung Chang and Prince Ching. Great Britain demurred to the last to making the conditions "irrevocable," but at last signed under protest, explaining that this must not be interpreted as a promise to enforce the demands with The note does not specify the troops. amount of indemnity to be paid by China, that being left to later negotiations. It is believed that the United States will favor a total demand of not more than two hundred million dollars, but upon this point we stand almost alone and the other Powers will doubtless insist upon a much larger indemnity. In spite of the general agreement that nothing ought to be done which will lead to the dismemberment of China, the only practical steps toward preventing this result are the two points upon which our government [has insisted from the beginning: that only such punishments shall be demanded as China is able to inflict without seriously endangering her dynasty, and that the indemnity demanded be such as China can pay. In securing the incorporation of the first of these points in the joint note. our diplomacy has won a victory; the contest over the second is still to be fought out. But even if by these safeguards the perpetuity of the Chinese government is guaranteed, there remains an equally important point to be guarded on the other side. There is a need of skillful diplomacy lest the wily Chinese, taking advantage of the clemency of the Powers, contrive to escape without adequate punishment for the crimes of which they have been guilty.

The question of constructing a deep water-way between Chicago and St. Louis by way of the Des Plaines, Illinois and Mississippi rivers, is being seriously considered by the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors. A proposal to make a deep water-way from Chicago only to the mouth of the Illinois river was disapproved, but the committee was so favorably impressed with the idea of establishing effective communication by water between the two great cities that it has decided to recommend an appropriation of a quarter of a million of dollars for the survey of a route for a fourteen-foot channel. It is expected that the report of the committee will be presented and that its bill will come up for action in the House immediately after the holidays. It is noteworthy, too, that the Missouri river appears to be virtually abandoned as an object of appropriation. It is claimed that the money appropriated by Congress for keeping the river navigable in years past has been used in the interest of particular localities in strengthening the banks to keep the towns from toppling in. To be sure, there is a somewhat intimate connection between a stream and its banks. but the federal government owns only the former and does not care to be held responsible for the protection of the latter.

THE PASSING OF THE CEN-TURY.

We stand at one of the great way-marks of history. The most marvelous century in the annals of time is in its closing hours. A little while more and it will have taken its flight into that mighty Past which sepulchers the forgotten zons of the infant world. It has witnessed many remarkable achievements since its birth and will trans mit to its successor vast treasures of knowledge acquired by experience and research. It must also bequeath to the twentieth century many unfinished tasks and many unsolved problems. Every advance in the world's civilization raises more questions than it answers. No one, however, with clear vision, can look back over the history of the century now closing without realizing that since its birth we have come into a new world of ideas, activities and aspirations. Many pens in many papers, magazines and books have told and will tell during the coming year the wonderful story of the century's progress. Something of that will be done for our readers in these columns in the coming volume of this paper. In a series of articles we shall attempt to point out some of the achievements in the line of religious progress during the century now departing and some of the things which remain yet to be achieved in the century which is just dawning. In this article we shall offer only a few general reflections.

It is commonplace enough, of course, to speak of the wonderful changes which have taken place during the century in methods of rapid communication between different parts of the world; but it is not always realized what other mighty changes must follow in the wake of these. The effect of having the affairs of the world brought before our constant attention through the agencies of the telegraph and the daily newspapers, aided by the railroads and the steamships, can but be profound and far-reaching. It is destroying provincialism, sectionalism, and all narrow limitations in the range of our sympathies and interest, and is making cosmopolitans of us all. We are much better acquainted with the actual condition of the world than we formerly were. We are much more deeply interested in whatever relates to the welfare of the people in the various parts of the earth. The unification of the race, together with the decrease of racial prejudices and antipathies, is steadily going on under these influences. Let the condition of the world in this respect as it exists to-day be compared with what it was at the beginning of the nineteenth century, and we cannot fail to see the great progress made toward that universal brotherhood of man which it is the purpose of Christ to establish.

The general diffusion of intelligence among the masses of the people is one of the great achievements of the past century. Formerly a few only were educated, while the vast majority were kept in ignorance. It has been the glory of the nineteenth century to bring education within the reach of the poor, so that at no time in the history of the world have the masses of the people so enioved the benefits of learning. It is easy to see what would be the result of this general diffusion of knowledge among the people in government, in religion, in industry, in invention and in discovery, and along all the lines of material progress. Much of the social unrest which is so characteristic of our times is but the result of this awakened intelligence on the part of the people, who have come to understand better than heretofore what their rights are, and are beginning to demand them. There are always dangers accompanying these changes, but in the long run the world is benefited by them.

Not only has the nineteenth century brought the whole world into neighborhood, so that its knowledge, its material products, its inventions and discoveries have become the common property of all, but it has also by its historical researches, by its archæological investigations, disentembed buried ages of the past, with their governments, their laws, their literatures and their religions. The student of to-day has at his command such a knowledge of the distant past as was not possible to the greatest scholars at the beginning of the present century. This uncovering of buried civilizations can not but have a mighty influence in modifying our conceptions concerning the present order of things and the probable future of the race.

Chief among the great ideas or discoveries in the realm of science is that sublime conception known as evolution, which, with whatever modification in details may be made by future investigations, will probably remain as the most masterful generalization which the unaided human intellect has ever produced. Theistic evolution, which is the only evolution possible to a believer, is God's method of creation and of carrying forward the infinite changes which enter into the development of all living things. This conception of God's way of dealing with the world and all its tenantry has powerfully affected man's conception of God and of His relations to the world. It is too early yet to state what changes it will necessitate in our theology, but if the hypothesis be true, it is safe to say that its influence will be in the direction of truth, and will prove beneficial to mankind, as truth always does. Whatever errors or crudities may be associated with the theory of evolution—and especially the superficial error of mistaking secondary causes for the primary Cause—will be removed in time by a wider induction of facts and by riper and more reverent scholarship; but we may be sure that the world will never turn back to the carpenter theory of creation, nor to any other conception that is less sublime, and that pays a less tribute to the power, wisdom and majesty of the Creator, than the theory known as evolution.

Space forbids us to speak here of the remarkable growth of democracy during the present century. A competent writer has been employed to deal with that question in a separate article and in an early issue of this paper. It must suffice here to say that under the influence of Christ's teaching and the example of our own great republic of the west, the right of the people to have a voice in the government and in the enactment of laws under which they are to live, has been increasingly recognized in all civilized lands, until to day the doctrine of the "divine right of kings" is held subordinate to the divine right of the common people. No throne is secure now which does not rest upon the affections of the people and which does not stand as a bulwark for their liberty and protection. This is an essential outgrowth of the spirit of human brotherhood inculcated by Christianity. It can only be a question of time when every throne, or potentate, or custom, or law, or institution that oppresses man, that deprives him of his rights, must go down beneath the rising tide of that spirit of democracy which has received such a mighty impetus during the closing century.

Vastly more important than all material progress is this increasing recognition of the rights of man as manifested in the larger measure of liberty and of power now accorded to the people, and in more humane legislation for their protection from the encroachments of avarice or power. In this readjustment of our social, political and industrial life, there is bound to be more or less disturbance, and perhaps excesses, but out of it all will come a fairer distribution of the rewards of labor and a higher respect for man as man, regardless of those artificial distinctions which, in the sight of God and in the sight of that more Christian civilization yet to be, count for nothing.

A great century is passing from our view; a greater one, we believe, is about to dawn upon us. With all the wealth-material, educational, scientific and religious-which we have inherited from the past, the twentieth century ought to witness much greater progress than has been made in any previous century. It remains to be seen what use we will make of these resources and opportunities. Believing as we do in the guiding hand of God in human history, we cannot doubt but that the new century will lead us onward, far onward toward the dawn of that golden age of which prophets and seers, poets and sages have sung from the beginning of time.

A TALK WITH OUR READERS.

This is the last issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the year 1900. With this number we close the Thirty-seventh Volume of the paper. When the present editor took his pen in hand to write for its editorial columns, the century had thirty-two years vet to run. Now its course is finished. There are many readers who have been with us all these years, but a still larger number, of course, have come into our CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST family later. Many of these readers we have met face to face, but many others we have never seen. And yet between us, whether we have met in the body or not, there is a mutual feeling that we are not strangers. So often have we met in spirit that we feel we know each other. In the confidence born of this relationship, we wish to speak a few words to our readers in this closing number of the volume and of

Our first word shall be one of gratitude for the continued support of so large a constituency. The past year has witnessed the largest increase in our circulation, perhaps, of any one year in the history of the paper. And this advance has been gained under circumstances which have tested in a very striking manner the loyalty of our readers. The words of appreciation and encouragement which have come to us through the year have cheered us in many a weary hour. We feel sure that no editor has greater cause for gratitude to his readers for their sympathy, their charitable judgments and their loyal support than have we. If it please them to continue their patronage the coming year, we shall spare no labor, and no expense which we can afford, to make the paper more worthy of their support than ever before.

We are grateful, too, for the gracious favor of God, without whose aid we can do nothing. During the entire year, though often unwell, we have never missed our regular contributions to the paper for a single issue. The same immunity from severe illness has been enjoyed by our colaborers on the paper. Few can realize, without experience, the amount of care and labor necessary to get out so large a paper as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST once every week in the year. It has pleased God to grant us a prosperous year in all departments of our publishing business. We have tried hard to win success and to deserve it, but we know how futile all our efforts are without the blessing of God. We may be pardoned for quoting here a few sentences in our annual message, as president, to the directors of the Christian Pab. Co.:

"I cannot close this brief report without an expression of deep satisfaction at the entire absence of all friction in the operations of the company throughout the year. The employes of the company have rendered faithful service, and have done it in a spirit of cheerfulness and pride in the company's welfare which has been most gratifying. All heads of the departments have given the highest satisfaction by their persevering labor and their whole hearted devotion to the interests of the company, as well as by the wisdom they have shown in devising and executing methods for the increase of our business. I desire to bear this testimony to the fidelity, industry and efficiency of our employes in every department of the company."

We have taken the liberty of giving our patrons this inside glimpse of our operations because we believe they are interested in the welfare of the company and will be glad to know the facts we have stated. While in one sense this company is a private corporation, in another sense it is a public institution, managed and controlled with the supreme aim of extending the kingdom of God, and of promoting human welfare. It has been and shall continue to be our steadfast purpose to conduct all the business of the company, as well as its various publications, in such a manner and spirit as befit the name of the company. We have dedicated the company to the great work of publishing and distributing Christian literature, and of supplying the demand on the part of our readers for such literature. We are increasing our facilities continually for doing this kind of work, and have done it on a larger scale the past year than in any preceding year. The present outlook indicates that the first year of the new century will prove to be a record-breaker in the extent of our publishing business.

We have already outlined, in part, our plans for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1901. If you have read this prospectus you have perceived our purpose to make the paper more indispensable to its patrons than ever. No religious journal to day may expect to hold its own unless it advances its standard of excellence to meet the growing demands of its constituency. There is no need that we state what shall be the policy and spirit of this journal during the coming year. These are well-known to our readers and the only change contemplated is that of superior merit which we shall strive continually to attain. Grateful to a generous brotherhood for sympathy and support in the past, and with a firm reliance upon the Almighty and the All gracious Father for continued guidance and strength, we close another volume of our paper and face with courage and hope the unknown perils and problems which await us in the century which is about to dawn.

Editor's Easy Chair

It would seem entirely in order that the "Easy Chair" should say something in this number by way of closing up the century in an appropria e manner. But as we have never had any experience before this in closing up centuries, we may be readily pardoned for any lack of propriety in the manner in which it is done. No doubt we shall be able, by the close of the twentieth century, to do the closing act more effectively. The "we" in this sentence, however, stands for that editor of the far away future who shall then control the destinies of the Christian Evangelist. That ed has not yet been born, and proba be for at least a half-century. But he will arrive on the scene in time to take his place in the line of our successors, and to show his readers of that far-distant time what a superior thing the journalism of the closing part of the twentieth century is to that of a century gone by. No doubt he will have to face a very different set of problems from those which now confront us, and if there should appear in his writing an air of mild condescension as he refers to the problems and the thinkers of the present time, he will only be doing what his predecessors have done from time immemorial. The most common form of injustice, even among fair minded people, is that which is perpetrated against the generations of toilers who have preceded us.

No dreamer, or prophet, or seer would venture to predict with certainty what strange and wonderful things are to occur in the new century which lies before us. Who, for instance, could possibly have imagined the developments of the past century? A century ago the city in which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is published was a small trading post in a foreign country. The territory belonged to France, and what is now known as Missouri and the great plains beyond, westward, were practically an unknown wilderness. It was three years after that date before the Louisiana Purchase occurred-the event which we are to celebrate in St. Louis in 1903 in a world-wide Exposition. The United States at that time consisted, for the most part, of the fringe of states along the eastern sea-board whose stars appeared in the flag of the Revolutionary war. No statesman at that time ever dreamed of such an expansion as has occurred in our national domain, which is not an empire, but a glorious sisterhood of states united in fone -Republic, stretching from the lakes of the north to the gulf at the south, with its shores washed by the two oceans. The steamboat, the locomotive, the telegraph, the 'cable, our free school system, to say nothing of [more modern inventions and institutions, were then unknown to the world. As for the ocean grey-hounds, and the great transcontinental railways with their lightning express trains, the wildest fancy had not imagined them. Modern conveniences and luxuries that 'are' now considered commonplace by the masses of the people, were not enjoyed then by kings, emperors and princes. The first message that flashed across the Atlantic cable which connected the Old World with the New, was,"What hath God wrought!" This is the exclamation that arises in one's mind as he looks back across the track of the century past, and notes the mighty achievements which have made the nineteenth century more glorious than all those which have preceded it.

Taking the progress of the past century as a basis for calculation, and making due allowance for the increased momentum, and the accelerated speed with which the world is moving forward to its mighty goal, i would scarcely be possible to exaggerate what are likely to be the triumphs of the coming century. No doubt there will be great physical changes, all tending to promote human longevity and comfort. Methods of communication will be even more rapid, and far more reliable than at present. New and improved methods of heating will take the place of those now in existence. Agriculture, mining, manufacturing and distribution will all be carried to a higher degree of perfection. Cities will enjoy better sanitation, better municipal government, and improved dwellings for the poor; they will probably also own such public utilities as street car transportation, water-works, lighting plants, etc. Railroad travel will be made more comfortable, much safer and much cheaper, and the railroads will either be owned by the government, or kept under strict regulations by the government. Ships will probably pass through a great water-way from Lake Michigan to the Gulf of Mexico, by way of the Illinois and Mississippi rivers, and it is not improbable that ships of distant nations will anchor at the port of St. Louis with their cargoes from many foreign lands. Educational methods will be greatly improved, colleges reorganized and adapted to modern conditions, and the moral teaching of the Bible will be considered as legitimate a branch of instruction in the public schools as Grecian and Roman mythology. Religion will have a more distinct recognition in state universities. In a word, the close of the twentieth century will find this world a better place in which to live and enjoy life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, than it is at the present time.

But the most important inquiry after all is, What of Christianity in the twentieth century? Nothing is more certain, according to our way of thinking, than that the religion of the Galilean carpenter is going right on from conquest to victory. It never had so deep a hold on the consciences and affections of the world as it has to-day. It has only begun, in late years, to deal earnestly with some of the most practical problems of life. The twentieth century is going to insist on an applied Christianity. And the more Christianity is applied, the more it will be seen to be adapted to the needs of men, and the greater its triumphs will be. When Christianity is permitted to purify and cootrol our political, social, industrial and domestic life, it will have opportunity to vindicate its divine origin, and infidelity will be dumb and impotent in the presence of its conquering power. Sectarianism will fade away as general intelligence and Biblical knowledge increase. The followers of Christ will become more and more united, and will not seek uniformity of thought, but co-operation in practical reforms, and in the evangelization of the world. The close of the twentieth century must witness a practically united Protestant Church. Roman Catholicism will either have greatly improved its doctrine and practice, and have given up a vast amount of superstition, or else it will be a waning power. The Bible, after passing through a fiercer ordeal of criticism than any to which it has heretofore been exposed, will come out of the crucible with the pure gold in it shining more resplendent than ever, and with its divine message vindicated against all the cavils of skeptics. Such, at least, we venture to predict, will be some of the triumphs of Christianity in the twentieth century.

A FORWARD MOVEMENT.*

Text: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." Ex. 14:15.*

COMMANDED TO GO FORWARD.

It is proper in this first prayer-meeting of the new year and of the new century, that we hear the voice of God speaking, not only through Moses, but through all the prophets and religious leaders of all the centuries, bidding His people to go forward. There is no place nor period for standing still in Christian life. Time does not pause in his flight; the revolving spheres do not cease their revolutions.

"Art is long and time is fleeting, And our hearts, though strong and brave, Still like muffled drums are beating Funeral marches to the grare."

We must, therefore, be up and doing. We must go forward or cowardly retreat. There is no standing still. No high hope, no worthy aspiration, no holy desire can be realized except by going forward.

METHOD OF GOING FORWARD.

How shall we go forward? The apostle Paul answers this question: "But one thing I do, forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press toward the goal" (Phil. 3:13). Here is the divine method of progress, "forgetting the things behin!;" emptying our hands and our hearts of all the rubbish of the, past and stretching forward to the things which are before; no backward looking or longing; no carrying the outgrown theories, habits and superstitions, which can only impede our forward movement; but utilizing every faculty and talent in stretching forward to secure the more valuable treasures that are before. We must forget as well as remember. We must discard as well as obtain. No great height of knowledge or of virtue can ever be achieved except on this principle.

THE GOAL BEFORE US.

"I press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3: 14). What is this goal or mark toward which the apostle pressed? Is it not the perfect ideal character of Jesus Christ? Is not this the true goal of all individual progress? All culture, all education and self-discipline, should have for its supreme aim this goal of life—a character patterned after that of Jesus Christ. What a magnificent aim is this! It is the only aim or purpose of life that is worthy of man's nature and origin.

^{*}Midweek prayer-meeting topic, Jan, 2, 1901.

ELEMENTS OF PROGRESS.

"But grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Peter 3:18). Grace and knowledge—these are two essential elements in Christian growth. Moreover, it is the grace and the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ in which we must grow. To grow in the grace of Christ is to cultivate the mind and spirit of Christ. John tells us that "the law was given by Moses; grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (John 1:17). It is this grace which came by Christ, and which is peculiar to Him, that is to be attained in Christian growth. It manifests itself in long-suffering and in forbearing one another in love, in forgiving those who have wronged us, in seeking to lift up the fallen and to assist the weak. But this growth in grace cannot well be carried forward without the knowledge of Christ-the knowledge of His character, of His will, of the truth which He taught, which He embodied, and which He lived—the truth which came by Him. This involves the use of our minds in reading, in studying, in pondering, that we may have an intelligent understanding of what He taught and of what He manifested. Here is an illimitable field of progress.

STEPS HEAVENWARD.

As a further analysis of that grace and knowledge in which we are to grow, the same apostle gives us the following steps heavenward: "Yea, and for this very cause [that is, that we m y "become partakers of the divine nature"] adding on your part all diligence, in your faith supply virtue; and in your virtue knowledge; and in your knowledge temperance; and in your temperance patience; and in your patience godliness; and in your godliness love of the brethren; and in your love of the brethren love" (2 Peter 1:5-8). Here is the kind of forward movement to which God is calling us as to our individual characters. The supplying of these graces is an essential part of our equipment for effective service for our fellowmen. It is the lack of these things that makes us "barren and unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ." What fitter time could there be to begin diligently and systematically to cultivate these Christian graces?

PROGRESS IN GOOD WORKS.

Let us not forget that we are commanded and expected to go forward in our educational, benevolent and missionary activities. The church, like the individual that lives for himself, cannot accomplish the purpose of its being. There must be an outreaching in all co-operative ways for the salvation of the world. Many individuals and many churches are decaying religiously because they are not actively enlisted in trying to make this a better world. Let the beginning of this new century witness the falling into line of a great company of those who have been standing aloof from active co-operation in those general movements among us which look to the extension of the kingdom of God; and may the year upon which we are entering be one of marked progress, both in the development of our individual Christian characters and in the enlargement of our work along all the lines of our Christian activity.

PRAYER.

"O God, our Father, from whose hand The centuries drop like grains of sand,"

Thou who didst guide our fathers through the perils of the past, wilt Thou be pleased to guide us in the untried paths which lie before us. May this century upon which we have just entered be the most glorious one in the annals of time, because of the growth of Thy kingdom in the world, and the triumphs of truth and righteousness. Help us, we beseech Thee, to be sharers with all those who are consecrated to Thy service in promoting the progress of Thy kingdom and the geace and happiness of mankind. To this end enable us to put away all that is unworthy and unholy from our lives and dedicate ourselves anew to the service of humanity, through the grace given to us in Christ Jesus our Lord, to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen!

Questions and Hnswers.

The following notice appears in one of our village papers: "The ladies of the Disciple Church will hold a coffee social at the home of ———," etc. Do you regard this designation of one of our churches as proper, and if not, why not?

D. W.

No; it seems to us an unfortunate designation of a church, lacking scriptural warrant, grammatical accuracy and conformity to the proprieties of speech. The word "Disciple" is improperly used as an adjective, and if it were an adjective, it would not be the proper adjective to describe church, as the church is presumably a church of Christ and should derive its name from Him and not from his members. We would be glad to see a universal disuse of such a phrase among us as "Disciple Church."

What is the distinction between "regeneration" and "conversion" as used in the New Testament?

N. P.

The word "regeneration" occurs only twice in the New Testament and in one of these instances it does not refer to the change in the individual, to which it is usually applied, but to the general process of the renewal of the world through the preaching of the gospel. In the other instance (Titus 3:5) it does refer to that spiritual change which men undergo in passing from death unto life. The distinction generally made by theologians between "regeneration" and "conversion" is that while regeneration is the act of God in the human soul, conversion is the man's act in turning away from sin to pursue righteousness. In other words, regeneration looks at the change from the divine side, while conversion looks at it from the human side. Strictly speaking, however, regeneration seems to be a process which includes what is meant by the term conversion. As a process it involves, just as generation does, being begotten and being born. In regeneration we are said to be begotten by the Spirit through the truth; but this is not an effect in which man is passive. The truth must be believed before the soul is quickened by it. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God" (John 1:5). To believe in Christ, therefore, is to be begotten of God. This life, begotten of God through faith in Christ, is manifested or comes to birth through obedience to Christ in the ordinance of baptism. Hence the statement, "Except a man be born of the water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." We would say, therefore, that the two terms stand for the same fact viewed from different points of view, and that each of them involves or implies both the divine and the human agencies. "Conversion" is a turning, or turning about, and refers to that change in mind and heart and life which man undergoes in becoming a Christian. While the turning is man's act, the influence under which he turns is of God.

What would you think of an elder who takes his meals and drinks his coffee frequently in a saloon where others drink beer, whisky and do other sins common to saloons? J. E. A.

We should say that such an elder, to put it mildly, has a very low estimate of the dignity and responsibility of his official position, and a very inadequate idea of his responsibility as a Christian. We can hardly conceive of such an one remaining in the eldership. Men who hold this position should be patterns to the flock and this example is not one certainly that it would be safe for the members of his flock to follow.

From what is the word "substance" in Hebrew 11:1 derived? What is the Greek word for the same?

The Greek word is hupostasis and means exactly what the word "substance" in the Latin derivation means, that which stands under and supports something. Faith is said to be that which stands under the things hoped for, and holds them up. In other words, it is that by which these hoped-for things become actual realities to us.

What is the remedy for a condition of things like this: A church in a given community has grown so worldly-minded, its members being given up to "society" and all manner of worldly amusements, that it cannot secure a preacher or retain him any length of time, and exerts little or no influence in the locality where it exists?

Preacher.

The remedy proposed to a church in a somewhat similar condition by the Master Himself was, "Repent, and do the first works; or else I come to thee, and will move thy candlestick out of its place." A church in such condition must be brought to repentance and made to realize its utter spiritual poverty. If this cannot be effected the "candlestick" has probably already been removed, and the best thing to do is to begin again on a new foundation, calling out of the defunct church such members as have some spiritual life, and a desire to cultivate it, and building them into the new organization. This, of course, is based on the idea that the religious element within the decadent church is not strong enough to control the worldly element. In any event, nothing should be "done through strife or vainglory" and every precaution should be taken to avoid bitterness and contention. It should be a profoundly earnest and sincere effort to save the cause in the community, and should be resorted to only when all other means have failed.

CHURCH UNITY IN SCOTLAND.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

An event of unusual interest occurred in Edinburgh during the first days of November, an event, perhaps, second to none in the religions history of that country. It was nothing less than the formal union of the two bodies of Presbyterians, known respectively as the United Presbyterian Church and the Free Church of Scotland. The story of these two branches and their separation from the old trunk of Presbyterianism is almost romantic. No religious history is more varied and full of interest than that which has found its theatre in this land of mist and rock. These children of the mountain and flood whose mothers with one hand stirred the porridge pot while one foot rocked the cradle have inherited the tenacity, courage and heroism of centuries of struggle and freedom. Mist and peats and heather were their surroundings and their faith was as fixed and immovable as the hills in which they lived, while their tempers were sometimes as sharp and their religious controversies as acrimonious as their surroundings would naturally suggest. The Presbyterian Church in Scotland was the natural expression of the Reformation in that land. When the new principles came across from the continent they embodied themselves in the teachings of such stern and heroic reformers as John Knox and Andrew Melville. The Episcopacy which had prevailed in other days was overthrown, and the reformed principles on the basis of the "Solemn League and Covenant" everywhere took possession of the country. Presently, however, the old Episcopal spirit revived and the church once more assumed the form of the Establishment, retaining, however, Presbyterian principles while abandoning the old simplicity of the reformers. There still remained, however, certain unbending Protestants who were called variously Conventiclers, Hamiltonians, Cameronians and Society People. These refused to enter the ranks of the state church, and were the first formal dissenters from the established church of Scotland.

Later on the question of the relation of church and state grew in importance and gave rise to various disputes and vexatious controversies in the Establishment itself. The result was that about the year 1730 certain vigorous remonstrances were addressed to the constituted authorities of the church by such leaders as the Erskines, Wm. Wilson, Alexander Moncreaf and James Fisher, who presently found themselves excluded from the fellowship of the Established Church, and formally constituted themselves into a Presbytery under the name of the United Secession Church. The immediate occasion of their withdrawal arose out of an act of assembly which abolished the last remnant of popular election of pastors by enacting that these were to be chosen exclusively either by political patrons or by the elders and "Protestant heritors," but never by the congregation as such. This seceding body of people increased until in 1745 there were forty-five congregations, and it was reconstituted into an associate synod. Unhappily, however, about this time a controversy arose among these churches, especially in Edinburgh, Glasgow and Perth, which resulted in 1747 in a breach, each of the two bodies formed claiming to be the Associate Synod; those who condemned all swearing of the Burghers' oath as sinful coming to be known as Anti-Burghers, while the other party were denominated Burghers. Between the two parties there was a bitter antipathy. The Anti-Burgher synod grew with considerable rapidity, but presently was split in two factions by the "New Light" controversies over the province of the civil magistrate in matters of religion, and this gave rise to still another body known as the "Constitutional Associated Presbytery." On the other hand the Burgher Synod, which had in the meantime increased and organized branches both in Ireland and North America, the latter of which took the name of the "Associate Reformed Church in America,"* found itself confronted by a similar "New Light" dispute, which led to a division in its ranks, the new body taking the name of the Associate or Original Burgher Synod. In 1820 the Anti-Burgher Synod united with the Burgher Synod, constituting the United Secession Church, thus marking the first step in the direction of return to unity. The second step of this character was taken in 1847 when this body united with the Relief Synod, which had resulted from the deposition of Thomas Gillespie and certain others from the Assembly in 1752 for refusing to take part in the intrusion of unacceptable ministers. These two organizations, the United Secession and the Relief Churches, thus laid down their differences and entered into formal union in 1847 under the title of the United Presbyterian Church. This is not the same in belief and polity as the United Presbyterian Church in America, which latter is the perpetuation of the old Cameronian, or protesting body which refused to go back to Episcopacy when the State Church of Scotland was established.

The Free Church of Scotland dates from the disruption in 1843, when a considerable body of ministers and congregations left the Established Church after what was known as "The Ten Years' Conflict," beginning in 1833. This conflict was begun by the veto act in which it was decreed to be the fundamental law of the church that no pastor should be intruded on a congregation contrary to the will of the people. But by various legal devices this agreement was limited in its application until a considerable portion of the church demanded recognition of the principle that there could be no political head to the church, but that all authority "flows immediately from God and the Mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ, and is spiritual, not having a temporal head on earth, but only Christ, the only spiritual king and governor of his Kirk." This spiritual jurisdiction was defended by the remonstrants, and between them and the party favoring the absolute authority of the church as a state institution there grew so strong a spirit of antagonism that in 1843 those who would not concur withdrew to a separate place of meeting and organized the first assembly of the Free Church, with Dr. Thomas Chalmers as moderator. The story of the Free Church is one of brilliant achievement and is filled with memorable names. It has been the party of progress and scholarship in Scotland. Such names as Chalmers. Dr. John Kerr, Principal Cairns, Samuel and A. B. Davidson, William Robertson Smith, Patrick Fairbairn, James Stalker, Henry Drummond, George Adam Smith, A. B. Bruce, Professor Salmond, James Denney and Principal Rainy have made that communion illustrious wherever Christian scholarship has been honored. That this body, which has seen its storms of controversy and has emerged slowly from the conservatism of the first half of the century until it is to day the aggressive and yet reverent champion of biblical criticism and modern science in their close relation to the teachings of Holy Scripture, should find it possible to unite with that branch of the church which is ordinarily considered most conservative in its character. is perhaps a matter of surprise to the casual observer. Nevertheless the event of this year is the result of a long series of conferences in the interest of union. In 1863 a motion was made and unanimously carried in the Free Church Assembly for the appointment of a committee to confer with a corresponding committee of the United Presbyterian Synod and with the representatives of such other non-conformist churches as might be willing to meet and deliberate with a view to incorporating union. For many years these negotiations were carried on, though apparently with little hope of ultimate success, though the Free Church Assembly by increasing majorities manifested a readiness for union. Finally, however, in 1873, the idea was abandoned for the time; but other negotiations which had been entered upon with the Reformed Presbyterian Church were more successful, and the majority of the ministers of that church, with their congregations, were united with the Free Church in 1876. It will thus be seen of how long and remarkable a history the present union is the climax, and how Presbyterianism in Scotland swung the whole distance toward a separatism which resulted in almost numberless divisions, many of which differed from each other but by a hair's breadth; and how now the pendulum is swinging as strongly in the other direction, away from the old individualism of the eighteenth century toward that unity of the church which was the apostolic ideal, and which is the promise of the future.

The exercises in connection with the formal union of the two churches were of the most impressive sort. After final and separate meetings in Free Church Assembly Hall and Synod Hall respectively, in which the final reports concerning the votes of presbyteries on the question of unity were received and the final words of counsel given by the moderators, the two processions started toward the Waverly Market and joined forces on Princes street, which, in spite of heavy weather, was crowded with interested spectators to witness perhaps the most notable scene in Scottish religious history. One could scarcely see such a sight without feelings of profound emotion, as the two processions, each made up of ministers and laymen, walking two abreast, headed respectively by their moderators, flowed into one stream consisting of four in each rank, two Free Churchmen and two United Presbyterians, and made their way like an army with united purpose to the scene where the final act of unification was to be consummated. In the vast hall which had been prepared for this purpose a congregation worthy of the event was assembled. Some of the most representative men in political and religious life were present, including Lord Aberdeen, Lord Rosebery, Alexander Maclaren, Josep Parker, Dr. John Watson, John G. Paton, the missionary, and Principal Fairbairn, of Oxford. Every form of dissent and several representatives of the Established Church, both of England and Scotland, were on the platform. It was a time of inexpressible interest and enthusiasm. More than fiftyseven years of Free Church history here came to an end, and more than a century of United Presbyterianism likewise made its last definite utterance. A psalm, that fine old psalm of unity, the one hundred and third, was sung, and then after brief preliminary services the act of unity was performed. Dr. Ross Taylor, the moderator of the Free Church Assembly, rose and addressed Dr. Mair, the moderator of the United Presbyterian Synod, in these words: "In the name of the Free Church of Scotland I offer you, honored brother, as moderator of the United Presbyterian Church, the right hand of fellowship in token of the happy union now formed by the two churches." Dr. Mair replied, "And I have the equally high privilege, in the name of the United Presbyterian Church, of offering you, honored brother and moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, the right hand of fellowship in token of the union now happily consummated between our churches." The next act was the choice of a moderator of the United Free Church which had thus been constituted. It was appropriate that the choice should fall supon the head of Dr. Rainy, the sole survivor of the committee on union appointed by the Free Church in 1863. It was a great week for this remarkable man, who has stood as the Principal of Free Church College in Edinburgh for many years, and has brought it to its present high position. In closing his strong sermon on this occasion he said: "If we have been aiming at private and worldly ends, let us hope that we may be disappointed, I proxy that we may; but if we have been aiming at the furtherance of the kingdom of God, why should we not have the liveliest expectations?" The occasion was made more interesting still by the participating efforts of the representatives of other churches, such as Dr. Maclaren of the Baptist and Dr. Parker of the Congregational. Mr. Spurgeon sent word from London: "I would dearly like to be present at the wedding and throw the old shoe after the happy pair. I would be very happy to throw my earnest prayers into the great treasury that I believe will come from the churches of England and the continent when they learn that the brethren of the Free and United Presbyterian Churches have been happily married in the Lord and are about to enter upon housekeeping." But perhaps he most interesting feature of all was the resence and address of Dr. Cameron Lees, the minister of St. Giles Cathedral, the old church famous in Scott's story, the "Heart of Midlothian," and a conspicuous landmark of the metropolis of Scotland. He said he came not as a representative of the Established Church of Scotland, but as a private individual. Nevertheless his presence was a matter of great satisfaction and his words had deep significance. Dr. Rainy, the moderator, had already affirmed that the union was incomplete; that without the Church of Scotland they could not be made perfect. Dr. Lees echoed this sentiment in tactful and touching words. He believed it was possible for him to work in any church, and lest there should, perchance, be a congregation in need of the services of a young man approaching his Jubilee, he hoped they would keep him in mind. He trusted that the new church would go on prospering and to prosper. To many who were present this speech opened an epoch. It was proof of the fact that whatever are the difficulties and controversies, there is in Scottish Christian hearts so deep a desire for union that it must one day come to pass.

Several times during the proceedings the terrible tendency to split in the Scottish church was referred to, and it was remarked that at one time three separate and hostile congregations worshiped in St. Giles Cathedral. More than one of the speakers believed that by and by there would be the ancient kirk of Scotland again, one open and free. The wall would be torn down by both hands working on both sides. These facts are deeply significant to those who believe in the possibility of uniting all Christians in a fellowship of faith and service. This consummation cannot be reached in a day, ordinarily it is not to be expected through the media of resolutions and platforms, but nevertheless it is coming in a quiet and constant manner by the closer unity of all who love our Lord. One can but feel that the vents which transpired in Waverly Market have marked a great advance in the realization of Christian Union. The attention of the religious world is being called to its possibility and necessity. The churches are moving toward each other as they move toward Christ. Dr. Parker, at City Temple, the non-conformist cathedral of London, in his Thursday noon sermon on the day after the act of union, spoke truly when he said: "The fewer distinctions we have the better. We are growing toward solidarity; we are growing toward a better knowledge of one another, and the more we know of one another, I believe, through the grace of God the more we shall esteem, love and honor one another. Have nothing to do with the perpetuation of mere controversial distinctions. Aim at true union of heart and sympathy, and the blessing of God will be upon us and we shall be able to show a united front to the whole world, and that we have been with Jesus and learned of him. This was the burden of the whole of this great event, that the Lord was among his people and his people knew that the Lord was in their midst."

THE PROBLEM OF THE CITIES.

FRANK G. TYRRELL.

Men and institutions usually succeed or fail according to their merits. "Deserve success and you shall command it," is in the main a wise admonition. Can it be true, then, that the Disciples of Christ have not heretofore deserved success in the great cities? Certainly they have not achieved it. In none of the cities of a half million or more inhabitants do we own a representative church building. We seem to be hanging on the ragged edge of these great centers. Some of our congregations are simply rural colonies in town. They count for little or nothing in the great social and religious movements of the community.

Why have we not deserved better success? In the first place, because we have practically neglected the cities. Neglect anywhere, to any degree, is ruinous. Not only has it been a handicap on our own growth but it has allowed the forces of unrighteousness to grow. Since the room was found empty, the evil spirit entered in, taking others with him. Of course, municipal unrighteousness has been fought by our religious neighbors. As conservative a body as the Episcopalian is fighting it now in New York City, but I fondly believe that the Disciples of Christ are more stalwart reformers by nature than the members of almost any other body; and that if we had been early on the ground, to study civic problems, there would have been swifter progress toward the ideal city and fewer evils to hinder the progress of evangelization. Now that we are beginning to wake up to the fact that the cities are strategic centers, we shall have to spend much time and money to atone for past neglect.

Again, we may be wise in many respects, but wise men sometimes play the fool and we have perpetrated inexcusable foolery in our work in the cities. Not to mention other points, we have foolishly fought among ourselves. The casus belli may have been the organ—think of it, discord about a producer of harmony!—the fair, the dance, the theatre, or it has been sheer weakness and wickedness, the pitiful lunacy of people who for lack of culture or common sense have devoured one another.

This foolish and asinine disposition to quarrel exists among the class that compose a large part of our population in cities, no matter where they find themselves. They are from villages or rural sections; they are underlings in business and in society; they must reign somewhere; so they try to play the tyrant in the church and, as some one has said, while tyranny from above is bitter tyranny from below is unendurable. Such folly should be swiftly punished by excision:

it invariably results in schism and weakness. We must outgrow the direful affliction—if we live long enough.

Our poverty is another hindrance. We are not because we have not, and when we have we hold. In smaller cities we have learned the wisdom and economy of investing in good church houses, but the lesson seems not to have been even studied in the large centers. We have put but little money into the work; we have sown sparingly, and we have reaped sparingly. Few of our cities have any conception of judicious advertising, and little or no money to invest in it.

Bad as this is, it is made many times worse by our exaggerated congregationalism. We have divided and scattered in little huddled groups here and there, until we are too few and feeble to be respectable. Preaching union, we have practiced disunion. Who ever heard of two of our churches uniting?

Better days are before us. Yet help should flow in from outside. Some one ought to build a memorial church in Chicago, another in St. Louis, another in New York, and then see that they are well manned.

HOW TO STUDY THE WISDOM LITERATURE.*

OSCAR T. MORGAN.

III. The book of Job also may be divided into five parts. 1st. Prologue, written in prose, chapters 1 and 2. 2nd. Colloquies between Job and his three friends, chapters 4-31. In these there are three cycles of speeches, each friend speaking three times and Job answering each, except that in the last cycle Zophar has exhausted himself and his argument and does not reply to Job. But there are a number of difficulties in Job's last speech, chapters 26-31, and a part of it may belong to Zophar. 3rd. The intervention of Elihu, chapters 32-37. 4th. The address of Jehovah from the whirlwind, with brief replies from Job, chaps. 38-42:6. 5th. Epilogue, written in prose, chapter 42:7-17.

1. The prologue introduces a man of established piety and great wealth, Job by name, living in the land of Uz in the midst of his family and friends. 'The Satan,' or 'Adversary,' is jealous of Job's great power and is doubtful of his piety. So at a council of the "sons of God," he proposes to put this piety to the test and to see how much of disinterested goodness Job has. God gives 'the Satan' full power over him, if only he will not touch his person. By a series of calamities coming alternately from earth and heaven, Job is stripped of all his possessions and his family. But as Job was not righteous for revenue only, he simply says, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be ne name of the Lord." 'The Adver ry' is given permission to test Job still further by smiting his person. Therefore he is afflict ed with elephantiasis, the worst form of leprosy, and the most painful of all diveases.

Even now in answer to his wife's appeal to "curse God and die," he only says, "What? Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?"

- 2. But the worst affliction of all was still to come. Job's three friends, hearing of the calamities that had befallen him, came and sat for seven days and seven nights by him on the ash heap outside the city. Seeing those who he had hoped would bring some comfort, even if they could not bring any material relief, sitting silent and helpless, he could restrain himself no longer. He breaks forth and curses, not God, it is true, but the day in which he was born. He has had experience for the first time with friends who are as a "deceitful brook," that dries up when it is most needed. The friends, each in his turn, try to convince Job that, since he is a great sufferer, he must have been a great sinner. But Job, conscious of the general rectitude of his life, denies that there is any such connection as they claim between physical evil and moral evil. He nowhere denies God's existence or His power; but he comes dangerously near denying His Providence and His justice, and he seems to have no conception of His love as Jesus revealed it to us.
- 3. After the friends have used up all their breath and their arguments, a new antagonist comes forward in the person of the young Elihu. In a very long and prolix introduction he tries to apologize for speaking at all, and he criticises the three friends for not answering Job in a better manner. In spite of his high claims, he adds nothing to the arguments except to lay greater emphasis on the idea of punishment for the sake of discipline. Many think that this speech of Elihu makes a decided break both in the thought and in the artistic form of the piece, and that it does not therefore belong to the original composition.
- 4. Jehovah now intervenes and addressing Job out of the whirlwind tries to bring to his mind such a rea'ization of the power and the majesty of Jehovah as will compel him to bow in submission before Him and to accept quietly whatever He sends. This vivid portrayal of God in creation and providence does for Job what no amount of mere argument could possibly do, and he humbly acknowledges his error. To get a personal vision of God in His creating and His saving activity can cure a worse unbelief than that of Job. Both the difficulty and the cure are summed up in his own words:
 - "I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, But now mire eye seeth thee." 42:5.
- 5. After this Job's prosperity is more than restored to him and he passes many happy years in peace and prosperity. This Epilogue seems to be a letting down from the high moral plane just occupied, that a life of disinterested goodness and trust in God is the highest ideal for man.

This book has been interpreted as literal history, as pure fiction, and as an allegory based on a historical event, but with large and free use of the imagination. To the careful and unprejudiced reader, it is hardly necessary to say that this can scarcely be historical at every point. The council in heaven must be merely symbolical. Many of the incidents seem to have happened for the express purpose of finding a place in this story. It is at least easily seen that the historical is everywhere subordinated to the didactical. If it is to be interpreted as an allegory, Job would represent the righteous in the nation, or Israel as a whole in their sufferings during the exile. In this latter case the composition of the book would belong to the period of the exile and it would be both a history and a prophecya history of Israel's past sufferings and a prophecy of the greater blessings that awaited them. Just when it was written is uncertain. The social situation pictured is that of the patriarchal period, while the religious and philosophical conceptions belong to the period of the exile, or later. There are but few that any longer place the time of its writing before the exile, and some portions of it may have been added much later than that. From whatever period it came, it is one of the greatest books ever written-great in its theme, great in its treatment of the theme both in thought and in art, and great in its revelation of God.

IV. The book of Ecclesiastes treats of human well-being and happiness. It represents a young man of unlimited means and ample power, seeking in every way that can be imagined to add to his own joy in living. From every form of dissipation into which he plunges, he returns with the same conclusion: "All is vanity, and a striving after wind." It may be the intention to represent this young man as Solomon, but it is certain that Solomon did not write the book. Both the thought and the form belong to a time long subsequent to his day.

The growing skepticism with regard to good and evil may be clearly traced through the three Wisdom books that have been considered. In the book of Proverbs, it is taken for granted that the good are always prosperous and the wicked are always in trouble. In Job the question is up for the keenest discussion, and the answer hangs in the balance by a thread. They have not yet solved the problem of the relation of moral evil to physical evil, and they have not even found out that it is insolvable. In Ecclesiastes philosophy has exhausted itself in the vain effort to answer an unanswerable question, and it is content to transfer it to the realm of religion where it belongs. Ecclesiastes is plunged in deeper doubt than Job even; but for that very reason he is the more willing to return to God, and leave to Him the government of the world. His conclusion is that one should "fear Gcd, and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man." This conclusion will do very well for faith, but the arguments that lead up to it are very unsatisfactory. His partial failure is due to the fact that he studies life from the standpoint of selfishness. His whole effort is directed to the inquiry how to get the most out of life. If he had sought to show us how to put the most into life, his investigations would have been more helpful. We will never understand God and hu nan duty until we cease to try to get the most out of life and strive to put the most into it. Our success is determined not by how much we get, but by how much we give. The power of our lives does not consist of the in flow but of the out-flow.

ENGLISH TOPICS.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

Returning home after my vacation I find that there are signs of a coning revival of religious interest. As the report of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society very correctly says, the war has caused a stagnation of Christian work. But the British are essentially a religious people and every time of spiritual inertia has invariably been succeeded by a great awakening. Therefore, if we can secure a lasting period of peace we shall expect to see the work of the Lord again flourish in the midst of this vast community.

OUR ENGLISH WORK.

A most interesting crisis is on us in our English work. I call it a crisis because any particular juncture which involves important changes is critical in the issues it may involve. For some months the English Board has been considering the expediency of arranging certain mutual exchanges of spheres between our ministers. Both pastors and churches have been most carefully and considerately consulted. A few of our preachers had intimated that in their opinion the time had come for giving their congregations a ministerial variation. And it was found after deliberation and consultation with all the parties concerned that certain movements might be made with great probable advantages. Some of us seem as if riveted to our spheres. Some of us believe in long pastorates under proper conditions. But an elastic and accommodating system is the happiest. It was agreed that Rapkin should remove from Margate to Birkenhead; that Brearley should leave Birkenhead to take charge of the good work at Fulham in Tasso Tabernacle; and that a new man should be brought into our ministry. The new pastor is W. J. Travis, who is au earnest member of the Chester Church and has for some years been the temperance missionary of the city of Chester. Bro. Travis and his wife have long since won the admiration of us all, and our committee had resolved to find at the first opportunity an opening for him. He ardently loves the principles and the work and has been of valuable service as a frequent preacher in our northern churches. Travis follows Rapkin at Margate.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF CONTINUITY.

I believe in continuity. I also believe in occasional "solutions of continuity." Of course, when you suddenly stumble into a deep hole on a dark night you have encountered a very nasty solution of continuity. But when you arrive at the natural and proper termination of a road, you recognize that you are at the beginning of some other road which you must next pursue in due order. So it is with the ministry of any man. It has its beginning, its course and its ending. Some preachers and pastors continue their ministry beyond the end. They come to the end of their usefulness, the end of their acceptance, the end of their right to stay any longer; but still they persist in staying on. I think that the right and sensible spirit exists in all our ministers. Some beautiful illustrations of it have just been furnished. The ministers whom I have mentioned as shifting from their respective locations to others of our churches, have gone without the slightest objection or demur exactly where the committee advised that each should remove. I have never seen a set of ministers more entirely devoted and consecrated to the work or more willing absolutely to sink all personal preferences or prepossessions. Our brethren in this English ministry do not for a moment need any recommendation from me, and yet I cannot refrain from expressing my great admiration of the disposition in which they have acted. This augurs well for the work they will do, as it accounts for the great good I have myself seen resulting from their past labors. They are brethren to be proud of. The reasons for expedient changes are various. I need not specify any of them, for they prevail in America as well as in England, and will always be prevalent in a world where human nature holds its sway. Rapkin has begun his new pastoral career at Birkenhead with a great stir, the church being crowded and a number of additions being secured at once. I have been presiding at the welcome meeting in celebration of the arrival of Bro. and Sister Brearley at Tasso Tabernacle, Fulham. Bro. Brearley had already preached two Sundays and it was delightful to hear the public testimony of several of the ablest men in the church to the manner in which the new minister had captured all hearts. The occasion was a most enthusiastic one. Think how my own soul was filled with satisfaction at this recognition meeting. For my mind went back to the time thirteen years ago when I started that same cause in Fulham, erecting the Tabernacle and gathering a new people in a new district, under the stimulating and inspiring guidance of Dr. W. T. Moore, and with the cordial and generous co-operation of our noble church at West London Tabernacle. who acted munificently, notwithstanding all their own heavy burdens. Tasso Tabernacle, Fulham, is naturally unspeakably precious to me and I am proud and delighted to be at times invited over to it on special occasions.

SOME LITERARY REFERENCES.

We must all move on a double line of rails. We must cultivate the process of "double cerebration," for the human brain is a two-fold structure. My own life is always happy in proportion as I can cultivate both the intellectual and spiritual pursuits for which our wonderful age so marvelously provides. I often wish I could get hold of some of the grand American books which I see advertised. Then again I often wish that my studious American brethren could share my own privilege in getting quick access to the best publications appearing in London and on the Continent. Some magnificent books have recently come out from the English press. Here is one department of life, at any rate, which the unhappy war has not blocked. The booksellers evidently expect a lively winter season. The English are a real reading people. They delight on winter nights in quiet reading round the blazing open fire which is the sacred domestic symbol of home comfort and joy and love. This week a fine batch of biographical books is out, on which the critics have instantly seized with avidity. The most remarkable of these is "The Life and Letters of Zachary Macaulay, by his granddaughter, Viscountess Knutsford." In this delightful book, which I hope will be largely read in America, we have at length what has been so long needed-a record of the life and work of one of the noblest of our grandfathers, chiefly known hitherto only as the father of the celebrated Lord Macaulay. This Zachary Macaulay was buried in Westminster Abbey. Sir James Stephens' inscription on the tablet says that this hero not only aided "those who rescued Africa from the woes and the British Empire from the guilt of slavery and the slave trade, but meekly endured the toil, the privation, the reproach, resigning to others the praise and the reward." In his youth Macaulay spent two years as book-keeper in a sugar plantation in Jamaica. What he saw of the treatment of the slaves made his blood run cold, though he tried hard to get rid of his sense of squeamishness. Wilberforce's first motion for the abolition of the slave trade was made in 1789. About the same time Granville Sharp's colony of free negroes was planted in Sierra Leone. Zachary Macaulay was sent out to report on the condition of things in the colony. So great was his ability that he was soon appointed governor. It was an arduous and difficult post, but he succeeded splendidly in it, and now for the first time we discover from this book the simplicity, the earnestness and the profound religious trust on which his heroic life was based. So completely in his case had the fear of God cast out all other fear that amidst the gravest perils and the most bewildering responsibilities, it never occurred to him to question whether he was brave or not." The story of Macaulay's courtship is a romantic one. While on a visit to England after an attack of fever, he was introduced to the famous Hannah More and her four sisters, who were then living at Cowslip Green, near Bristol. Residing with them was one of their old pupils, Selina Mills, with whom Macaulay quickly fell in love. The five maiden ladies, with whom Miss Mills lived as a sort of sixth sister, made it impossible for him to propose, but as he was leaving the house he saw Miss Mills weeping bitterly in the drawing room, and in a few moments the lovers were pledged to each other. The sisters were wild with annovance, but Hannah was the first to come round, and the engagement was soon avowed. Zachary Macaulay was one of the world's great emancipators. He was one of the grand pioneers and originators. He took active part in establishing the Bible Society, the Church Missionary Society and the Religious Tract Society. He was the chief founder of the Anti-Slavery Society. Hannah More wrote to him that he must be a Hercules to carry on such enterprises. But he was nothing of the sort. This heroic philanthropist was a weak and delicate man. His mind overworked his body. His activity in all public matters often affected his health; to his private fortune it was fatal. In the terrible struggle he lost all that he possessed. The history of philanthropic enterprise has no such record of unselfish labor to show as that recorded in this volume of Zachary Macaulay's Life and Letters. I consider that this volume is the most pathetic and interesting spesimen of biographical literature published for many a day. Of some other new books I will write in my next letter.

CHRISTMAS SONGS.

H. R. TRICKETT.

It is midnight and the town clock has just struck twelve. How profound is the silence. I recall the days of auld lang syne and think of the past Christmas days. Another Christmas day is now here. I am alone with God. What thoughts arise within me. There comes to me a melodious mingling of songs of little children and minor murmurings of wintry winds. I see a group of little children standing under a window and all around them the ground is white with snow. How dark the night is and how keen the wind and how far and bright the light shines out of the window. They have a little sprig of holly in their hands and the red berries shine in the rays of light from the window. And they are singing a Christmas carol, for it is Christmas. Dear God, how long ago it was, but how wonderful have been thy mercies. Can it be possible that my voice ever sounded like that childish treble and such an ecstasy of innocent joy was ever mine? It is more than half a century ago but I reme uber that night well. It is one of the precious recollections of my childhood. I recall the refrain the children sang and with throbbing heart keep saying it over and over. It was an old English Christmas carol, dear to lovers of folk-lore, but dear to my heart from its associations and its infinitely precious meaning to me now. This is the refrain I recall:

> God bless you, merry gentlemen, Let nothing you dismay, For Jesus Christ, our Savior, Was born on Christ was day, And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

"Tidings of comfort and jny," yea, verily, blessed words are they, full of grace and truth. No wonder the whole world is glad to-day because the Babe of Bethlehem was born. The world never heard so glad a song, no, not even when the morning stars sang together, as the gloria in excelsis of the angels. Peace on earth, good will to men; would that it were in verity and deed so. But it is coming and coming quickly, and will be here much sooner than our weak faith anticipates. The world has s vung out of darkness into a brighter and nobler day since the angelic choristers sang on Bethlehem's plains. And the light shines brighter farther on, and will shine brighter and brighter till the perfect day.

How my heart rejoices when I think what a glory yet awaits the world. Sin shall be a thing of the past. Thanks be to God for the multitudes who are now in the kingdom of God's dear Son and over whom sin has no dominion, and these are but the advanced guard of that mighty host that soon shall own the Christ as king; unjust and unrighteous rulers shall not curse the earth, for a scepter of righteousness shall be the scepter of his kingdom. Ignorance shall disappear, for the knowledge of the Lord and the glory of the Lord shall fill the earth as the waters do the sea. Poverty shall be unknown, for selfish greed shall not exist and no one shall hunger or thirst; wars shall be no more, for swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks. Satan shall be bound in the bottomless pit, and from the ends of the earth and all around its vast circumference shall ring out the joyful shout of multitudinous millions: Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent doth reign!

Therefore, I love the Christmas hymns. Dear to me is the song of the angels. Dear to my heart are the children's Christmas carols. Dear are the grand old hymns the saints of God have sung in the past, and dear are the modern hymns the saved of the Lord sing now. The old carol was the song of my childhood and I love it, yet here is a hymn, rough perhaps in rhyme and meter, but it tells the faith of the strength of my manhood.

Gloria in Excelsis. Come, let us gladly sing, Gloria in Excelsis be forever to our king. Oh shout aloud for gladness, oh be glad, ye saved, to-day,

For the morning light is breaking and the night has passed away.

Gloria in Excelsis. He has come, the mighty God. He shall trample on the wicked, He shall rule them with his rod.

He shall smite the powers of darkness, He shall hurl kings from their throne;

He shall lift up high the humble, He shall claim them for His own

Gloria in Excelsis, for the old has passed away, The new, in robes of splendor that shall never know decay,

Has come to banish ancient wrong; to lead in freedom's van,

And teach the world God's fatherhood—the brotherhood of man.

Gloria in Excelsis. Lo He comes, the Prince of Peace.

His brows are bound with olive wreaths, He bids all wars to cease, And morning stars and angel songs together shall combine

To hail the King of Righteousness—the government divine.

Gloria in Excelsis. Let all the earth cry out, And earth, and sea, and sky, and stars, join in the mighty shout,

For one is born this blessed day to whom all knees shall bend,

His reign shall be forever more, His kingdom have no end.

B. B. TYLER'S LETTER.

There can be no reasonable doubt that ere is an increasing interest in Bible study. Some time ago the American Institute of Christian Litera ure suggested that a Lord's day in the month of September should be observed as Bible Study Sunday. The result, up to the first of December, was the organization of 350 classes, including abou 7,500 persons in churches of all denominations. The average membership of these classes is about 15. So far as I am informed the largest class is in Worcester, Mass., and numbers 184. Three persons constitute the smallest class.

The classes in Chicago for the study of the English Bible under the direction of Mr. Newell continue, I believe, with an undiminished interest. These classes have been in existence three or four, possibly more, years. I had the privilege of attending one of these meetings more than a year ago. It was estimated that 1,200 persons were present. When I saw how interested the people were and observed how little information they obtained from their teacher I said, "Surely the people are hungry for the word!" Almost every evening in the week Mr. Newell meets classes, similar in size and character to the one mentioned in Chicago.

The Rev. J. M. Gray, D. D., of Boston, is the man with whom this particular method of Bible Study originated. Dr. Gray is a cultured Christian gentleman. As a Bible teacher he is much above the average. His fundamental assumptions, however, as to what the Bible is are erroneous, and this of course injures his work from first to last. One of the first questions to settle, and one of the most important in the case of every one who proposes to be a tea her of the Bible, is this: What is the Bible? What the Bible is not; what it is, and how to read it, are topics of primary importance. But there is encouragement in the movement inaugurated by Dr. Gray in this respect-those who enter his classes are required to read the assigned lessons a number of times before coming to the place of meeting, they are then requested to name the chapter, or chapters, selected, from the contents of the section. This is good. It insures a reading of the Scriptures and some thought thereon.

A few days ago I read a letter, a private letter, written by Mr. Messer, General Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association in Chicago, concerning H. L. Willett and his work as a Bible teacher. At the time this letter was written Prof. Willett was conducting a meeting in the hall of the Central Association, 153 La Salle St., Chicago, at noon on Mondays. Two hundred men were present at each meeting; many of them pastors. Mr. Messer spoke in the highest terms of Dr. Willett and his work. He said that Prof. Willett was regarded as a man whose sympathies are with the higher critics, but in his work in the Young Men's Christian Association he had not spoken a word the tendency of which was to disturb, or undermine, faith in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. On the contrary, his work was distinctly in the interest of a deeper and more intelligent faith in the Bible. He said that Mr. Willett was the most attractive teacher of the Bible in Chicago. When two hundred, or more, men assemble at noon on a week day in such a busy place as Chicago to study the English Bible it means much in many ways.

Do you know that the most popular book in Christendom is the Bible? The following I have picked up from some writer to me unknown:

"The sun never sets on its gleaming pages. It goes equally to the cottage of the plain man, and the palace of the king. It is woven into the literature of the scholar, and it colors the talk of the street. . . . Some thousand famous writers come up in this century to be forgotten in the next, but the silver cord of the Bible is not loosed, nor is its golden word broken as Time chronicles his tens of centuries passed by. It is only real merit that will endure. Tinsel will rust in the storms of life. False weights are soon detected. It is only a heart that can speak deep and true to a heart; a mind to a mind; a soul to a soul; wisdom to the wise, and religion to the pious. There must then be in the Bible, mind and conscience, heart and soul, wisdom and religion."

At the beginning of this century there was not a single Bible Society, as such, in the world; now there are seventy-three, and through their agencies alone more than 280,000,000 of Bibles, including parts of the Bible, have been distributed. When to these are added the other millions of copies that have been published by the University Press of Oxford, and other similar establishments, it is calculated, and it is scarcely an exaggeration, that there are in circulation today, either in whole or in part, at least 500,000,000 copies of the word of God, on an average one copy for every three of the world's population. It is estimated that the expense of this enterprise is not less than $600,000,000. Neither "David Harum," nor "Robert Elsmere," nor "Trilby," nor "To Have and to Ho d," nor "The Reign of Law," as popular selling books, are to be named in connection with the Bible.

What a work the Christian Woman's Board of Missions inaugurated when it established the English Bible Chair in connection with the University of Michigan! Others have the good sense to imitate, to a degree, the worthy example of these noble women. I have recently seen the following from President Angell of the University of Michigan:

"Three of the religious denominations have established guilds here and two of them have erected buildings which serve as a sort of club house for their students and provide courses of lectures for them during the year. Another denomination has a foundation here for the partial support of lecturers on religious themes who are expected primarily to reach the students of their own denomination in their own buildings, or in the rooms of our Students' Christien Association."

"I sometimes wonder whether more use might not be wisely made of the state universities; whether wise economy of resources, as in the newer states, might not suggest such affiliation of various educational interests as would serve to throw around young men a distinctly Christian influence, and at the same time open to them the opportunities of a wide range of study which only a large institution can offer."

President Patton is beginning to see things. One of these days he will pick up a newspaper and will see what is going on in the world! Evidently he had not heard when he delivered this discourse of the work in progress in connection with the University of Michigan, the University of Oregon, the University of California, the University of Missouri, the University of Virginia, the University of Georgia, and the University of Wyoming. A residence and Christian Home for Young Ladies attending the last named University has been erected by the Episcopalians of Wyoming.

A committee of Baptists in the state of Washington, officially appointed, has made the following report:

"The Baptists of Washington have no institution of learning doing collegiate work. The University of Washington (state institution) is permanently established. Its resources are ample and growing. It is proposed to establish by the side of the University a Christian institution, federated with it, and under the auspices of the Baptist denomination; to equip it as a dormitory, on the model of a Christian home, and with a thoroughly competent man as head or president; the immediate equipment to represent an investment of $10,000; ultimately to be $250,000."

The University of the state of Washington is located at Seattle. The Baptist brethren propose "to teach those branches of learning essential to a finished education upon which the state does not enter, or enters in an incomplete way."

President Benjamin Ide Wheeler, of the University of California, says:

"There is a strong sentiment in favor of establishing the theological seminaries in the town of Berkeley in order that the men who are preparing themselves for the ministry may at the same time pursue work in the University of California. The Christian Church is the only denomination which has as yet taken this step, but the Pacific Theological Seminary of the Congregational Church is about to erect a fine building in Berkeley, close to the university grounds, and to remove to these new quarters from its present home in Oakland."

There is not space in this letter to tell you about a movement among the Lutherans in the state of Nebraska looking in the same direction.

In the "Twelfth Biennial Report of the Regents of the University of Colorado" I find the following:

"The Regents and Faculty of the University of Colorado are favorable to the development in Colorado of some such plan of co operation" as that indicated above. Here is another open door.

Denver, Col.

CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE.

Immediately after our little service on board Sunday morning, Oct. 7, we went ashore at Beirut, Syria. This is a city of modern growth, with a population of 120,-000, of whom only 36,000 are Moslems. There are 4,300 Europeans here, which will account for the fact that the town has 20 printing-offices, six hospitals, 38 Christian churches, and only 23 mosques. There are 65 boys' schools and 29 girls' schools. Of these the Moslems have 23 boys, and four girls' schools. The Syrian Protestant College, with its theological and medical course, and training college, together with the girls' seminary and the other American mission schools, with their religious press. are constantly sheding their light on Syria's darkness. In spite of the government's opposition many natives emigrate to America. This is especially true of the Christians and the people of Lebanon. As soon as they acquire a little means, however, they return, and are as kings among their neighbors. Many have built large houses. and are now only using one-half or perhaps one-third of them. The natives call these houses "American dollars."

We decided to go by rail over the French road to Damascus, 91 miles distant, and taking the dragoman with us as guide we sent the servants one day ahead. The railroad is a narrow gauge with 20 miles of rack-andpinion sections, over the Lebanon mountains. This range with its offshoots stretches southward, with slight interruptions, throughout the whole of Palestine. "On this broad chain lie the oldest and most famous places in the Holy Land."

In about four hours and a half we came 35 miles to Maallaka, where carriages for Baalbek are engaged. Here in its birth-place is the largest stone ever quarried, measuring 71x14x17 feet. Its estimated weight is 1,500 tons.

Here also are the ruins of three of the greatest temples of the ages: the Great Temple, whose dimensions are about 150x300 feet. was once surrounded by 54 huge columns of yellowish stone. There are only six of these standing and they are about six feet in diameter and 60 feet high. Standing on a lower level is a smaller building called the Temple of the Sun. This is said to be the "finest ruin to be found in all the world." Nineteen of its 46 columns are still standing and, including the Corinthian capitals, are 52 1-2 feet high. The Circular Temple is in the modern village and is much smaller. The cella is semi-circular and is surrounded by eight beautiful monolithic columns.

When you consider that three of th stones in the west wall of the second temple are 62, 63 1.2 and 64 feet, respectively, in length, and 13 feet wide and about as thick, you can readily appreciate the words of the poet-

"No, not in Egypt's ruined land, Nor mid the Grecian isles, Tower monuments so vast, so grand, As Baalbec's early piles.
Baalbec, thou city of the Sun, Why art thou silent, mighty one?"

Its history back of the third or fourth century of our era is a mystery unsolved.

We entered the Anti-Libanus Mountains at Reyak, 41 miles from Beirut, and 20 miles below this we entered the valley of the river Barada, which is the Abana of 2 Kings 5:12. Passing down this stream 101-2 miles we came to the village of Barada, which is the Abilene over which Lysanias was tetrarch as mentioned by Luke (3:1) and Josephus.

On the hill above the village is the Tomb of Abel which, according to the Koran, marks the spot where he was slain by his brother. On the hillside is also a Roman road 300 paces long and 16 feet wide hewn in the rock. We followed the Abana river 28 miles to Damascus, beyond which it loses itself in the great marsh. Most of its waters, however, are consumed by irrigation and in supplying the city. Its valley is well cultivated, and has many apple, apricot, walnut and poplar trees.

Damascus, the oldest city on earth, and the largest of Syria, was, according to Josephus, founded by Uz, the grandson of Shem. It is first mentioned in the Bible in connection with Abraham. David conquered the city and garrisoned it, and it is often mentioned in connection with the wars recorded in 1 and 2 Kings. "It passed successively under the dominion of the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, Romans and Saracens, and was at last captured by the Turks, A. D. 1516." (Peloubet.)

Damascus is regarded by the Arabs as an earthly reflection of Paradise, hence the city is "lavishly extolled by Arabian poets." And after spending eight days in the mountains and desert I do not wonder that the Arabs coming from the desert think they have reached the earthly semblance of Paradise when they reach the well-watered gardens, vineyards and shady orchards of Damascus, which well represent the idea of Paradise as defined in the Koran. The city is built much in the shape of a spoon, and the Moslems of Damascus always take spoons as souvenirs in their annual pilgrimages to Mecca. From a distance the city appears very beautiful, but when you enter the narrow, dirty, filthy, crooked, and mudwalled streets your poetic feelings grow quite prosy as in vain you hasten on looking for a cleaner spot.

It is beautifully situated on a circular plain which is very fertile and about 30 miles in diameter, and is located just south and east of the Anti-Libanus mountains. If the dingy old mud walls, which are about 12 feet high, and surround every yard, garden, vineyard and orchard, could be torn down, the city would present a vastly different appearance.

We went to the only hotel in this city of 200,000 inhabitants, and entered through a little door which is about 2x4 feet in dimensions, and is cut through one of the large double doors. Just inside the doors was a small court, and beyond this a circular space with a fountain surrounded by most beautiful plants and strange new flowers. The doors from many apartments opened into this circle, and the floor of the whole as well as of the halls was covered with loose tiles, and the feet of seven Americans on these sounded as though as many Texas ponies were passing.

Many of the natives sleep on the flat roofs where it is cool, but our beds were in nice, clean rooms and were surrounded by musquito netting, and judging by the full chorus outside it was "a good thing." The tile floors of the interior were covered with matting. All the houses of the eastern cities have iron gratings over the lower windows and look like American jails. When we asked the guide why these bars were on all the windows, he said: "You do dat to shut men in; we do it fur to shut 'em out." There are 71 mosques and 177 chapels and schools where the Koran is taught. This constitutes the curriculum of the masses of Moslems, and when it is completed their education is finished. The Jews have 14 synagogues and eight schools for boys, and the British Syrian Mission supports four schools. We spent much time in the bazaars, and visited a few of the "10,000 looms of the most primitive character," which are still used for weaving silk, cotton and woolen

I could scarcely control my emotions when I realized I was nearing the "street called Straight," and was soon to behold the site of the conversion of the great apostle to the Gentiles. We drove around the wall and near the south-eastern corner came to a gate that is now walled up which tradition says is the one over which Paul was let down when he made his escape from Damas-

The same tradition says a certain George let him down after the gate was closed at night, and we were shown the grave of this St. George just across the street in an old but well kept cemetery. Along the wall and on top of it, with windows extending out over, are many houses that are doubtless like the houses from which Paul made his escape. We drove northward from here past the house of Naaman the leper, and saw many lepers near it. We passed through a large gate and entered Queen's St., which is pointed out as the "street called Straight." It runs entirely through the city from east to west, and has only a few small crooks in it. In the Christian quarter near the east gate we were shown the house of Ananias, and west of this on "Straight St." the house of Judas, where Ananias found Paul after his three days' fasting and prayer. Of course no one can tell whether or not these houses are on the exact spots designated, but they are undoubtedly near the places they repre-

On July 9 and 10, 1860, this part of the city was destroyed by fire, and 6,000 Chris tians perished at the hands of the bloodthirsty Turks. Many sought refuge in the British and Prussian consulates, and many were saved by the Algerian ex-chief Abdel-Kader and his Moorish retinue. Ahmed Pasha not only remained quiet, but it is said gave the signal for the slaughter to begin. It is estimated that at least 14,000 Christians perished in these days of terror. A French corps of 10,000 men was hastily dispatched to Syria, and many of the ringleaders, including Ahmed Pasha, were beheaded. The Dases were dispersed and many of them emigrated to the Houran. while many Christians moved to Beirut.

After his conversion Paul straightway "preached Christ that he is the Son of God, in the synagogues . . . and confounded the Jews which dwelt at Damascus, proving that this is very Christ." This good work continued and increased until the days of Constantine, when Christianity became so powerful that the great heathen temple was turned into a Christian church, and the sacred place of Jupiter was consecrated to Jesus. It was afterwards remodeled into a mosque. The Turks claim that 1,200 artists were summoned from Constantinople to assist. It once contained a casket in which the head of John the Baptist was shown, and was hence named the church of St. John. The building has been partially destroyed by fire several times and has never been restored to its former magnificence. It was badly burned in 1893, and was remodeled, only to be badly burned again recently. A great company of men are working diligently to restore it, and the prophetic inscription placed over the door by the son of Theodosins will still stir the hearts of all Christian pilgrims as they read: "Thy kingdom, O Christ, is a kingdom of all ages, and thy dominion lasts throughout all generations."

The Fruits of Coffee Drinking.

"The fruits or results, in my case, of coffee drinking, were sallow complexion, almost total loss of appetite, as well as sleeplessness and sluggish circulation.

"I was also very billous and constipated most of the time for eight years, and became so nervous that I was unable to do any mental labor and was fast approaching a condition where there would have been no help for me.

"I am convinced that if I had continued using coffee much longer the result would have been a total mental and physical wreck.

"I sometimes think the all-wise providence looks after us in trouble, at any rate, when I was in despair a friend urged me to give up coffee entirely and use Postum, giving the reasons why. It was hard for me to believe that so common a beverage as coffee was the cause of my trouble, but I made the change, and from the first trial experienced a benefit and improvement. My complexion has improved, the nervousness gone, as well as the bilious trouble and sleepleseness, and I am completely cured of sluggish circulation. In fact, I am well, and the return to health has been directly traced to leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. I recommend Postum to all coffee wrecks without a single reservation." -Jares D. Kimball, Isabella Street, Northampton,

B. A. HINSDALE.

AN ADDRESS BY G. H. JOHNSTON.

Some of you knew Dr. Hinsdale longer than I, some of you knew him more intimately, but none have cherished a more constant and affectionate admiration for the man and the scholar. When I entered his office for the first time the desk and floor and chairs were strewn with big, coarse quarto sheets, covered with straggling lines which he called writing-be loved a quiet joke-which in moments of inspiration he was sometimes able to decipher. Hardly once in all those years did I find him but that he was surrounded with these sibyl line leaves, and not once did I see him thus but that there came to me those words of the younger Pliny to his younger friends: "Mould out of yourself something, hammer into shape something which shall be yours forever and in the converse of generations yet unborn preserve your soul alive."

Between the noonday splendor of hopeful Greek philosophy and the slowly breaking dawn of the Christian promise of immortality there intervened a night of appalling blackness; the bleak gloom of despair settled upon the spirits of thoughtful men for whom the present was decay; the future, annihilation. Then it was that this great est of men-the admirable Pliny-in sheer hopelessness clutched at the shadowy possibility that in his writings there might be immortality, that somehow the essential self of him might cling to the written page; hence the urgent, insistent exhortation: "Create something which in the discourses of coming generations shall preserve alive your soul."

Dr. Hinsdale differed from the noble Roman in the calm conviction that the essen tial self of him was divine and imperishable as divinity itself. Hence he wrote with equal eagerness not that many-tongued Fame might herald him down the ages but that he might find out truth or the foundations of truth. Much of his writing is fragmentary, incomplete.

To me it is like the work of the Roeblings digging for the foundations of those massy buttresses which hold up Brooklyn Bridge, or the 20-storied piles which divide the clouds with their daring fronts. Out of their excavations there come up broad flags which serve well enough for footways, big masses of close-grained stone good enough for superstructure, but all of it detritus which must be cleared away from the solid primary ledge. It is this bed rock of the eternal unchanging verities which he sought to lay bare, on which he was beginning to build.

Contemplating the phenomenal activity of his mind during these last ten years, the constantly increasing fecundity of his pen, it is reasonable to infer that another ten years on which he could well count would have ranged him first among the foremost investigators of the educational world. With him each day's fullness was promise of a riper morrow. He died in the early prime of great possibilities.

The nature of the man was roomy, generous, patriarchal, faithful to the uttermost, gentle as a woman's for those who came near enough to feel the beating of that big heart. Sometimes abrupt in manner, he was singularly accessible to any one in need of a helpful hand.

The atmosphere of his hospitable home was serene, cloudless happiness, a fragrant memory to those who breathed it. His noble unselfishness, the integrity of his purpose dignified life and plucked the sting of death. What Pliny despairingly dreamed and faintly hope! we dare believe with cheerful confidence.

THE MISSION OF JOHN.

G. S. BRYANT.

Jesus somehow needed an introduction to the world. The God who made it had not a standing place thereon. Someone must prepare his way and make his paths straight. Who? There were devils who were candidates for this high office, but Jesus commanded them to hold their peace. Introduction by such agencies would mar, not make, his case. A good man cannot afford to use a bad character as his precursor in a community; how much less could Jesus harbinger the poetry of his life by a proem of devils. They are commanded to keep silence. If devils, though they believe and tremble, may not, cannot, take part in such high service, why not Pharisee or Sadducee? They knew the law, could quote Scripture as well as Satar, would they not therefore be entitled to perform this high function? Knowledge of law and recitation of holy passages do not certify character. If they did, the gates of heaven would not be wide enough to accommodate the multitude that would face atout, and thereby suddenly change from the downward to the upward road. If interpretation of law gave assur ance of good character in the interpreter, the thief would stand as fair a chance for heaven as his defender. Perhaps he does. Jesus was not slow to recognize this, and with one sweeping, burning utterance brushed and burnt the whole tribe off the board. "Ye are of your father the devil." Pharisee and Saddocee are therefore barred from harbingering a man of God. Who then? The people of the Holy City had been encased in the law. They were as flies caught and fixed in amber-beautiful to look at through the transparent coloring of the law, but no true life. The life of Jerusalem was conventional. It was according to the fashion. If you wish to save your reputation when in Jerusalem do as Jerusalem does-it makes no difference how that There was little or no independent life. Jesus was cruc fied because he was not con-All individuality in the life of ventional. the city was destroyed, swallowed up by religious forms and ceremonies. The prophet, or seer, had died centuries before, and all th ught and feeling had crystallized. These needed to be released. The crystal must be broken. Jesus stood hammer in hand. Who can introduce him? Surely not these lifeless forms. If not devils, if not Pharisee or Sadducee, if not the common people, then who is left to perform the service? would that wilderness man do-he who is a voice, a prophet of the Highest? He is an unconventional man, does not belong to he "400," is not a link in the day's doings, sets the fashion for no one, nor is he the slave of that set by any other man. He is independ ent of all save God. He can say as he thinks without fear of boycott, and his thoughts are not those born of social forms, but of communion with God in the wilderness. Let us call him a tent-man. Tent-men prevent the stagnation which is gradually taken on by the streets and market places. Europe was a crystal until the incursion of wilderness-men of the North—the Goths—smashed it. Then modern history was born. Note the wilderness-man is indispensable to progress

The daily living of this man does not depend on his saying the pleasing thing to the crowd, for he lives on locusts and wild honey; neither does his raiment depend on his acting to please the multitude, for it is of camel's hair and a simple leathern girdle. He is a courageous, truth-telling man. Independence in character fosters these virtues. It takes society to develop fear and Why? I do not know, but the falsehood. fact that they are generally found together might lead to the false hypothesis that one gave birth to the other. If you question the wilderness man, you must expect a straightforward, conscientious arswer, no circumvention. If he is anything, he is serious. One of the best illustrations of this character in the Old Testament is Elijah, "the grandest and most romantic figure that Israel ever produced." He was one man against a kingdom. He met King Ahab in the highway. It was the wilderness against social organization. See the king in his chariot suddenly confronted by this tall, sinewy man, hair hanging long and thick down his back. Now the lank figure raises his long, skinny arm and forefinger, and says: "A the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." This he says and retires. He speaks what he has to say, though as a result, he must look to the ravines for his food and the brook Cherith for his drink. The openness of his character and the strength of his utterance compel him to make his home in a cave. In the case of Moses, it took forty years of wilderness life to balance a like number of conventionalism in Egypt, before he could become a fit instrument for God's message. wilderness man then is the most fit of all men to introduce the Master to his world. Of those born of women none is greater than he for his high function. Listen to the words of this courageous, independent, God-fearing man. They are strong, seeking no favor: "Generation of vipers," "Repent," "the axe is laid to the root of the trees," "the chaff shall be burnt with unquenchable fire." This is the man that answers in the most direct manner questions of soldiers, publicars and common people. The menace of the soldier could not keep him from saying, "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely, and be content with your wages." The riches of the with your wages. The riches of the publican could not hide the manner in which he obtained them, and this judge from the wilderness said: "Exart no more than that is appointed you." The love that he had for the sheep who wandered about as having no shepherd expressed itself in "he that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat, let him do likewise." Even the king in his palace could not escape his keen moral vision: "It is not lawful for thee to take thy br ther's wife." Behold this man on the banks of the Jordan, the center of the unconventional, the true, the sincere—a preacher of righteousness. All men are attracted to him-naturally attracted to him. Jesus also comes. They are alikeonly Jesus is the stronger and sweeter. He has the wilderness character, though brought up in the street and city. It is a question which shall baptize the other. John submits and Jesus submits. Jesus recognizes John. John recognizes Jesus and introduces him to the world as the Coming Man, the Lamb of God.

Our Budget.

-"The Christian Star," says our admirable contemporary, the Cumberland Presbyterian, "has five points -love, happiness, thoughtfulness, generosity, gratitude." So it has, and they are points which sweep the whole horizon of human sympathy and brotherhood and at the same time point up to the zenith of our common Father's love. Calvinism has its "five points"-but they do not point that -The International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association has appointed Sunday, Feb. 10, 1901, as the annual day of prayer for students. It is appropriate that this day be observed not only in educational centers and in the Christian organizations in colleges and universities, but by Christian people at large wherever there are those who know the perils and the possibilities of student years and appreciate the vital importance of the consecration of the students of today to the Christian work of the twentieth century.

-"The day may be far distant," says Dr. John Watson ("Ian Maclaren"), "but it is almost certain to come, when there will be one Free Protestant Evangelical Church throughout England." This is another one of the many voices crying in the wilderness of our denominationalism saying, The united kingdom of heaven is at hand. The prayer of Jesus, the teaching of the New Testament and the present tendency of things in the religious world furnish an ample basis for such prophecies.

-The annual report of the St. Louis Provident Association, which we have recently received, shows a good record of charitable work done during the past year by that well-equipped and wisely managed institution. We published a few weeks ago an article setting forth the methods employed. In equipment and method it is entitled to be called a model charitable institution. The Christmas spirit of love and good-will is a beautiful and a Christ-like thing, but it takes organization to make that spirit effective all the year round. Of course no amount of money given through an organization can take the place of personal sympathy and helpfulness, but citizens of St. Louis and vicinity may well employ this agency to insure the wise use of such funds as they may feel disposed to give for charitable purposes.

-A Catholic reviewer writing in a Catholic paper about a Catholic book on American church history, characterizes it as a great exhibition of "thoroughness, learning, energy and zeal." The writers, he says, "do not rush at conclusions like men of the stamp of Hubert Howe Bancroft and Henry Cabot Lodge. They have no preconceived ideas to bolster up and therefore no bias along which to twist the facts which they unearth." This statement of the utter impartiality of Catholic historians and their absolute freedom from bias, is in its way rather good. While it is unquestionably true that some valuable contributions to church history have been made by Catholics and that, too, in realms where the statement of the exact truth is not at all to the advantage of the papacy, it is also true that these works have uniformly received chilly treatment (or hot treatment, as you prefer) at the hands of the hierarchy. Every reputable student of history knows, be he Protestant or Catholic or infidel, that the average Catholic history, the kind that is recommended in their papers as reliable and as exhibiting "energy and zeal," is about as much like sober history as Grimm's Fairy Tales are like Gibbon's Decline and Fall. Mediæval Catholic scholasticism consisted in accepting a proposition as true because the church said it was true and then proving it by philosophy. Modern Cathalic history of the zealous type consists in asserting with pretense of proof those things which the church wishes were true.

-One of the features of Christ's church which our own and preceding Reformations have sought to restore is its simplicity of worship. The Roman Catholic Church has made its public worship a travesty on New Testament teaching. Dr. Farrar quotes a Roman Catholic author as follows: "O! then what delight! What joy unspeakable! The stoups are filled to the brim; the lamp of the Sanctuary burns bright, and the albs hang in the oaken ambries, and the cope-chests are filled with osphreyed baudekins, and pix and pax and chrismatory are there, and thurible and cross!" Surely, with the assistance of "pix" and "pax" and "Osphreyed baudekins," men ought to be able to confess their sins to God, ask forgiveness, and give Him thanks for mercies received! But what of the millions of believing souls who have never heard of these Romish devices?

-Our Missouri State Corresponding Secretary, T. A. Abbott, of Kansas City, Mo., calls our attention to the fact that the second Lord's day in the new year is the time for the missionary collection for state missions, which will be the first offering for missions in the new century. He states that the demands of the treasury for state missions are very urgent in view of the enlargement of the work, and desires us to appeal to the churches of the state for a very prompt and liberal offering in January. We are glad to convey, not only this appeal of our Corresponding Secretary to our Missouri readers, but to add to it our own hearty endorsement and to urge upon the churches the necessity of pushing vigorously the work in Missouri. Let the preachers of the state and the church officials take this matter under consideration and begin to plan for meeting this obligation in a way that will discharge their responsibility and give a new impetus to our cause in the state.

-One of the strangest things about the advancement in scientific knowledge during the century past, is the mistake made by many scientists who, seeing the glory and wisdom of the creation, instead of adoring the Creator, actually made the very laws which manifest the manifold wisdom and power of God, a substitute for God! And they talked about what the laws of nature were doing in the material world, as if the laws of nature were anything more than the Creator's methods of accomplishing results in the world of matter. Romanes lived long enough to correct his mistake in this respect, but the wonder is that so acute a mind could ever have made it. Many materialists are still deifying "law" and banishing God from the universe! They may know something of science, but they are as blind as moles to the higher truths of philosophy and religion. "I am come a light into the world," said Jesus, "that whoseever believeth on me may not abide in the darkness.' But of course if men "prefer darkness to light," there is no way of compelling them to see the glorious realities of the spiritual world.

-A correspondent sends us a clipping from the Sunday-school Times, of July 11, '96, containing an editorial on "Being Converted," in which the editor corrects the faulty rendering in the Common Version, and teaches unmistakably that conversion is man's act in turning to God. The editor says in that article: "The popular thought is that conversion is wrought on or in a man by outside influences, or by a force from above. Bible thought is that conversion is the act of the individual himself, for which he is directly responsible, however he may be affected by influences from without and above." Our correspondent thinks it probable, in view of the unmistakable teaching of this article, that we may have misunderstood the editorial which we recently reviewed, showing that man had nothing to do toward his own salvation. We think it hardly possible to reconcile the teaching of the two articles. They were probably written by different men. If conversion is a condition of salvation, and if it is man's act, then surely man has a part to perform in his salvation, though not, of course, as we explained in our review, in the way of providing that salvation or of meriting it, but only of appropriating it and then working it out, God working in him both to will and do his good pleasure.

-As a timely admonition to our contributors to use simple language in their articles, we cannot do better, perhaps, than to quote the following advice given many years ago by a wise father to his grandiloquent son at college:

"In promulgating your esoteric cogitations or articulating superficial sentimentalities and philosophical or psychological observations, beware of platitudinous ponderosity. Let your conversation possess clarified conciseness, compacted comprehensibleness, coalescent consistency, and concatinated cogency. Eschew all conglomerations, flatulent garrulity, jejune babblement, and asinine affectations. Let your extemporaneous descantings and unpremeditated expatiations have intelligibility, without rhodomontade or thrasonical bombast. Sedulously avoid all polyayllahical are bombast. Sedulously avoid all polysyllabical pro-fundity, pompous prolixity, and ventriloquial ver-bosity. Shun double entendre and prurient jocosity, whether obscure or apparent. In other word speak truthfully, naturally, clearly, purely—and don't use big words."

Rheumatism in all its forms is promptly and permanently cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla which neutralizes acidity of the blood.

-An eastern paper reports a New York minister as uttering these words in a sermon directed against amusements: "Why must we amuse our young people so much? Life is a place to work. We have all eternity to play in." It would be interesting to know just what theory of eschatology is held by this profound thinker who maintains that heaven is a place of infinite and unbroken recreation. After all, though his statement of it is unusually bold, perhaps his view that there will be nothing to do in heaven but promenade on golden streets, sing anthems and finger golden harps, is not so unusual. None of us knows what our employments will be in the hereafter, but it is safe to repudiate this juvenile doctrine of eternal amusement as the perfection of glorified existence.

—It is an old-fashioned idea and one which no longer obtains credence in intelligent circles, that the Bible is dull reading and the study of it an uninteresting employment. There are many Bible classes in this country numbering several hundred each. Perhaps the largest in Missouri is a class of 300 in Columbia, taught by the editor of the Columbia Herald. The members of the class are adults, many of them members of the State University. They do not attend out of sense of duty, nor by reason of parental control, but because they like it. The same thing is possible in almost every community where a competent and inspiring teacher can be secured.

S. D. Dutcher.

This brother, whose picture adorns our first page this week, is a native Missourian. He was born June 16, 1857, and began preaching in his eighteenth or nineteenth year. He attended college at Christian University, Canton, Mo., from which he has the degree of A. M. He was for many years the successful pastor of the church at Hannibal, Mo., where he was greatly beloved. Leaving that pastorate he located with the Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati, where he remained for a time, doing a good work with that congregation Like other Missourians, however, his heart yearned for Old Missouri. Having received a unanimous call from Mexico he accepted the same nearly two years ago, during which time there have been nearly 200 additions to the church, and a revival in other directions no less important than its increase numerically. He is just now in a successful meeting with his home church, in which, at last accounts, there were about 70 additions. Brother Dutcher unites in a high degree the two desirable elements of a good preacher and a good pastor. His sermons are thoughtful, his delivery good, his manner free and easy in the pulpit, and he knows how to reach the hearts and consciences of the people. He is at present President of the Missouri Lectureship and a member of the Board of Trustees of William Woods' College, Fulton, Mo. He is yet a young man, and when we asked for his photograph, he declined at first, on the ground that he was not sufficiently known among the brotherhood to make it worth while to publish his picture. It was only through the assistance of his wife, who is a faithful helpmeet, and who, in this case, as in many others, is "the power behind the throne," that we succeeded in securing the picture.

Notes and News.

G. F. Assiter has accepted a call from Foristell, Mo., for 1901, and will divide his time between that church and Troy.

W. H. Fry, Creal Springs, Ill., has prepared a set of 156 "subjects" with Bible references on each and will send a copy of the set to any address for $1.15.

The congregation at Bowling Green, Ohio, of which John Ray Ewers is pastor, has issued a neat souvenir and directory. The congregation has over 300 members.

An experienced pastor and evangelist, middleaged, who has held one pastorate in Ohio ten years, wishes to locate with a church in the West. For particulars address L. O. Thompson, Milton Center, O.

Lawrence Wright, who has been working under the Iowa State Board for more than a year, has closed his work under the direction of the Board and will soon enter the field again as a general evangelist. Churches desiring his services should address him at Hopeville, Ia.

The Board of Church Extension has just received $2,700 from the estate of Marion E. Parmly, Paynesville, O., making $10,000 which has been received from all new sources since October 1. The Board must have $50,000 this year in order to reach the half million by 1905.

T. H. Blenus, pastor of the Adams Street Christian Church, of Jacksonville, Fla., whose name appears frequently in our list of contributors, is contributing a series of weekly religious articles to the Jacksonville Times-Union and Citizen, the leading daily paper of that state.

W. P. Bentley, of the Christian Institute, Shanghai, China, has published a 25-page pamphlet entitled "Christ Triumphant Through the Years.' It is a brief survey of the history of missions by centuries and contains a large amount of missionary information concisely stated. It might well be used as an outline for the study of missionary history.

The Christian Orphans' Home in St. Louis is full and overflowing with boys and more are coming. There are three times as many boys as girls, but three out of four of the benevolent people who want to give a home to an orphan child, call for a girl. The Home is full to the limit, but more are coming—mostly boys. The management of the Home would like to communicate with persons who wish to provide homes for boys.

The Mormons are carrying on an aggressive campaign in Omaha, Neb. W. T. Hilton has been delivering a series of lectures on Mormonism, out of which have grown the preliminaries for a debate between D. H. Bays, Disciple, author of "Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism," and Apostle Heman Smith, who is regarded as the strongest man among the Josephites or anti-polygamous Mormons. The discussion will begin Feb. 4, and it will be a heavy-weight contest. It will be followed by a vigorous evangelistic effort by our churches in Omaha.

The congregation at Brazil, Ind., of which A. L. Platt is pastor, dedicated its handsome new church on Dec. 16. J. H. MacNeill, of Muncie, Ind., preached in the morning on "The Twentieth Century Church" and in the evening on "The Church's Triumphs." In the afternoon a congratulatory service was held in which the pastors of other churches in the city participated. It was desired to raise $4,000, which desire was more than gratified by the pledge of $5 300. The church at Brazil has had a noble past and will doubtless have a more noble future.

The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases.

Swamp-Root is not recommended for everything, but if you have kidney, liver, bladder or uric acid trouble you will find it just the remedy you need.

If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes. You may have a sample bottle of this wonderful new discovery and a book that tells all about it and its great cures, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address, Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing, mention that you read this generous offer in the Christian-Evangelist.

The church at Boles, Mo., is about ready to dedicate its new building. It has received many gifts of labor and material, including hardware from the Simmons Hardware Co., St. Louis, and help from the other churches of the town.

During the first twenty days of December, 48 churches made offerings for Foreign Missions, a gain of 40 over the corresponding time last year. And during the same time 222 individuals made offerings, a gain of 183.

William Remfrey Hunt writes to us from Shanghai, Nov. 24: "We are all still in Shanghai and cannot return to the interior yet. We are preaching and teaching daily in Chinese in mission halls of our own."

During the Herbert Yeuell and Waite meeting at Sharon, Pa., in which 55 were added, Rev. Burger, pastor of Wheatland Baptist Church, Pa., took a stand for primitive Christianity and will receive recognition among West Pennsylvania preachers Jan. 1.

Herbert Yeuell, pastor of Shady Avenue Church, Allegheny, lectured recently on "In His Steps," illustrated, to large audiences at Sharon, Pa., and Paynes Corners, O. During his meeting at Sharon his home church worked up a large sale of tickets for his lecture on "The Tragedy of Quo Vadis," realizing $100.

- S. T. Willis, of New York, says that the American Christian Missionary Society is cooperating with the Atlantic States Conference in opening and sustaining the new mission at Newark, N. J. The society is supporting a pastor there at an expense of $600 per year, and the Church Extension Board is under promise to lend them $3,750 for a church site.
- J. B. Lister, corresponding secretary of the Oregon Christian Missionary Convention, Engene, Oregon, sends a clipping and a warning to the churches concerning one Paul Kruger (not he of South African fame) who has been figuring as a preacher in Washington and Oregon, and whose reputation is such as to make it advisable that churches do not recognize him as a preacher of the gospel. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

We regret to learn that B. B. Tyler is suffering with an attack of la grippe, which will keep him out of his Denver pulpit during the holidays, and will probably deprive our readers of his letter next week.

J. P. Davis has resigned the pastorate at Fairfield, Neb, and is open to negotiations with some other church, preferably further South and East. The Fairfield Messenger speaks highly of him and his work in that city, but not more highly than Bro. D. deserves. We can heartily commend him to churches needing a pastor.

Four hundred Christian Endeavor pins have been ordered by the prison committee of the Kentucky union as Christmas gifts for the prison Endeavorers. Extensive preparations are being made to give the convicts in all the Kentucky prisons a share of the Christmas cheer. The Endeavorers throughout the State are contributing to this end.

Ninety three students were enrolled in the Bible College of Drake University for the term just closed. Preacting was regularly supplied at about sixty places by these, besides irregular supply work During the four months ending Sept. 15, these men preached 1,961 sermons, had 392 additions to the churches and raised over eight thousand dollars for church and missionary work aside from salaries. Our cause cannot fail to be strong in Iowa so long as it has such a force at its center.

The Orphans' Home at Louisville, Ky., is asking for a twentieth century endowment fund of fifty thousand dollars. A charitable institution can no more have assurance of continued existence and usefulness without an endowment than a college can. Donors of one thousand dollars can keep one child in the Home perpetually. Send contributions in any amount to Robert H. Otter, Box 300, Louisville, Ky.

O. P. Spiegel, minister First Christian Church, Birmingham, Ala., has been unanimously called for next year, but has not yet accepted. During the year he preached 236 sermons, hal 101 additions, made 1,500 pastoral and evangelistic calls. Three years ago that church had 133 members, now they have nearly 500. Then they met in an out-of-the-way place, now they have the most central lot in the city. Three times has the church raised his salary and paid every dollar promised.

F. M. Rains, Cincinnati, wishes to secure the following numbers of the Missionary Intelligencer: Three copies of the February number, 1900; six copies of the March number, 1900; five copies of the April number, 1900; six copies of the May number, 1900 (Children's Day Exercise); three copies of the June number, 1900; six copies of the December number, 1900. If any friends will forward the above numbers to him, they will greatly oblige. He is willing to pay a reasonable amount for these copies.

Two weeks ago the Kawaiahao Church in Honolulu, the oldest church in the Hawaiian Islands, celebrated its seventy-fifth anniversary. Nowhere has the work of the missionary been more closely connected with the advance of civilization than in Hawai, and the American Board (Congregational), under the auspices of which this church was founded and maintained, has had a conspicuous share in this work. Ministers and missionaries of other denominations participated in the celebration. Our own Bro. John C. Hay delivered an address in place of Governor Dole, who was unable to be present.

Prohibitionists United.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

In your issues of September 13th and October 11th, you present most admirably the position of those who vote the Prohibition ticket. Herman S. Piatt, in the latter issue, also fairly well represented a very large number of sincere Christian voters. The Christian with atrophied conscience is of a third class. They are numerous. I do not wish to reply but only to add a word looking to a solution of the difficulty so plainly brought out in the above-mentioned articles.

You all desire prohibition. You are numerous enough to elect a large number of representatives in all departments of your government. You hold the balance of power. Through division you lose your opportunity. But few Christian voters seem to believe that they should turn their country over to the rule of the worst of two bad parties just for the privilege of registering their highest convictions in a party where their votes do not elect. The fear of losing a vote divides your forces. Can this be overcome? It can.

As with the man who drinks there is need of moral suasion to quicken the conscience and also legal enactment to remove the temptation, so with the voter there is need of a quickened conscience and also a legal enactment to remove the temptation to conceal one's highest convictions for fear of losing his vote.

Did it never occur to you that you cou'd have a second choice on a written ballot as well as in oral voting? In a public assembly, when you hold the balance of power, you nominate a man representing your highest convictions and vote for him. Falling to elect, you then proceed to vote for a man you can elect. Your vote was not lost because your first choice was defeated. The plan of proportional representation would secure this end. It would unite at the polls all who favor prohibition. This is an important step.

Virginia Notes.

The pioneer work in Henry county is succeeding. Evangelist C. E. Elmore is stirring things to a white heat. The meeting recently held by him in Mt. Olivet Methodist Church resulted in thirty-four additions. The pastor on last Sunday, I am told, closed the doors on us. We hope to use the school-house in the future.

Some of the Methodists at Leatherwood and Beckham are begging for a meeting. I am determined by the Lord's help to push the work, and Elmore will hold meetings in private homes in these communities.

Elmore reports two baptisms at Stella.

Spray is without a pastor. This is a mission. The Cotton Mills Company pays $200, the State Board, $100, and the mission, $150. Bro. J. M. Price is our leading member.

I am now with Bro. J. A. Spencer in a meeting at Chatham. Our night audiences have been large and att-ntive. Bro. Spencer has charge of this and the Danville Church and he is doing a great work.

Bro. Shelburne, of Roanoke, writes that they have a baptism at almost every service. The papers are devoting much space to his powerful sermons.

Some Y. M. C. A. Facts.

Is not the Y. M. C. A. one of the most potential factors in our modern Christian activities? It combines the holiness of physical living with that of mental culture and spiritual growth. It recognizes that young men must be taken where they are and the incentives of their young lives directed. There is a divinity in things physical, and through the superabounding energy of body the spiritual may be reached and cultured. The present is very real to youth and it must needs be used in directing him to more enduring things. Then the Y. M. C. A. does something practical for young aspirations. Got pity the youth that has none of them! It gives him opportunity and he would rather have it than money and favors. The various associations of America are conducting some 2,000 educational classes in which 25,000 young men are receiving instruction. They are also giving about 4,000 lestures and entertainments this winter which are of a much wider benefit than merely to the associations. Here in Ciacinnati, as well as in most of the large cities, a course of ten of the best attractions obtainable is given for the ridiculously small sum of $1, and the patronage runs up to 2,000 and more very often.

There are 500,000 volumes in the various libraries throughout the country and reports show that they are well used. Eighty thousand men are receiving methodical physical training and more than that number daily attend the various rooms for realing, recreation, etc. Aside from the secular training given, half a million men attend the Bible class sessions and the total attendance upon the purely religious meetings is five times that number.

Taat men of affairs believe in the institutional efficiency of it is proven by the fact that the National Committee reports property of more than $20,000,000 value. There are now about 300,000 members and 1,500 secretaries employed. Tais is for America alone.

Tairty-four of these secretaries devote themselves to army and navy work. In this needy field 7,000 men attend the daily services and nearly 4,000 the Biole classes. Traveling libraries are in circulation and last year 60 tons of reading matter were distributed besides. The railroad department is one of the most telling of all the activities. There is a total membership of 40,000 and hundreds of them are saved through this instrumentality. Rest rooms, baths, lunch counters, libraries, shop and other religious meetings reach these thousands who are so constantly away from home and exposed to temptations.

The colored men's department is growing and now numbers 5,000 with all the instrumentalities that belong to efficient work. Among the students there are nearly 200,000 members and approximately $2,250,000 is spent yearly for maintenance. Special attention is now being given to the boys' work and 25,000 are already enlisted.

Outside of America 43 lands are represented with more than 3,500 associations, nearly 300,000 members and $6,000,000 worth of property. Thus giving for the world more than 6,000 associations, 600,000 members and property value $26,000,000. What a mighty interdenominational tie and power ALVA W. TAYLOR. for good!

Labor Unions and Wages.

DEAR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:-Ia Bro. Tyler's interesting review of the "Chalk Line Over Morals," in your issue of Nov. 22, I fear he has been misled into a grievous error as to "the coal heavers' union"he mentions -one which does a gross injustice to labor unions and would add to a false impression that even so well informed a writer as our good bishop seems to have gained.

He says: "If some athletic young man wants to work at coal heaving * * * and he can handle twice as much coal in a day as men usually handle he quant to have the benefit of his inspiration and his athletism and receive twice as much wages as other men. But this the coal heavers' union will not permit." And again, "Nor can my boy have anything to say about the rate of his wages."

I have been a member of a labor union for a number of years, and have taken an active part in labor organization, but I have never heard of a union that has said a man should receive less than his employer desired to pay him. On the contrary unions generally seek only to fix a minimum rate of wages, below which a union man may not work, and he may, and frequently does, receive much more than this rate of wages. This is an old story to those familiar with the labor movement.

The tendency of labor union is helpful. Men are encouraged to better themselves, in the wellpaid trades at least, and many concerns in New York pay a minimum of wages far above that fixed by the union. But there is undoubtedly a campaign of misrepresentation concerning labor organizations, started for selfish reasons by a despicable class of employers who want industrial slaves instead of employes, and every incident to our discredit-and we know there are too manyis used broadcast to weaken a reform the church must aid if she ever expects to draw to her the great mass of men who love the Lord Jesus Christ. The gospel of the Son of God is a social gospel. It has to do with the relation which men sustain to each other. It is time for sane men, and unselfish, to speak on current social problems."

H. S. BUTLER.

New York, Nov. 24, 1900.

[Bro. Tyler would not, of course, do any injustice, knowingly, to the cause of laboring men. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is in most hearty sympathy with every movement that promises to better the condition of laboring men and give them a fair share of the products of their labor. Labor unions no doubt nometimes make mistakes, but they are necessary in the present industrial order. -EDITORI.

Missouri Mission Notes.

From many preachers throughout the state are coming words of encouragement concerning the work of raising that TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS for state missions. The need for contributions is right upon us. The surplus we had at the close of last year is all gone and we must have immediate response or we cannot pay the men in the field this month's salary. Some churches can do this and we trust to hear from them. We cannot afford to let a single one of these men wait for his money at this mid-winter season. If any have already their money in hand will they not forward to this office at once?

We very seriously regret that Bros. D. B. Warren and E. E. Davidson have both resigned their work for the Board. The former has been with the state work for four consecutive years, the latter but one; both have proven themselves worthy in every way of the trust reposed in their keeping. Brother Joseph Gaylor has been secured to take the place of Bro. Warren, and we hope soon to announce the successor of Bro. Davidson.

Three weeks from to-morrow will usher in the new century, and the first missionary collection in Missouri in the twentieth century will be for state missions. We want to make it the greatest missionary offering ever lifted in "Grand Old Missouri." We want every church in line and doing its utmost to bring about this consummation. Let there be no lagging; close up the ranks, and let us pull "all together" for that $10,000. T. A. ABBOTT. Kansas City, Mo.

Ohio Notes.

It is now about six weeks since Ohio Day and we have received thus far more than double as much money as we received last year in the same length of time, and besides this we have received two annuity funds, one of $50 00 from H. J. and Jane M. Randall, of Willoughby, and one of $300.00 from Mrs. S. A. Bartlett, of Cleveland. We are receiving many offerings from churches that contributed nothing last year and as a general rule churches are very largely increasing their gifts.

The following churches deserve special mention: Geneva was apportioned only $12.00, but under the efficient leadership of G. L. Cook, their new pastor, they secured an offering of $33 00.

The church at Millersburg, where P. H. Welsheimer ministers, was apportioned $40.00. They have reported more than $80.00 as the result of the offering, though the money has not been received yet.

The mission church at Newark, where M. L. Bates ministers, raised an offering of $102.96. 207 members contributed to it.

The mission at Orchard street, Toledo, composed entirely of poor people, sent in an offering of $12 00, and every member of the church except two or three contributed to it.

The mission church at Galion, O., where John P. Sala ministers, contributed more than $20 00.

The Painesville Church gave to state missions the largest offering it ever gave to mission work, amounting to $54 00. F. A. Bright, the secretary of the 17th District and the pastor of the Painesville Church, is largely responsible for this result.

The church at Killbuck sent in an offering of $21.10, which is considerably more than their apportionment.

Our mission work throughout the state is in excellent condition.

R. C. Lutton has taken charge of the work at North Baltimore and is doing very nicely. The church is in the midst of a strong canvass for funds to pay off about one half of its indebtedness.

The church has raised during the year $1,410.00 for all purposes, a large amount of which has been applied to paying floating indebtedness. Kansas City Letter.

The churches at the mouth of the Kaw report progress. The ongoing has not been of the dizzying kind; from week to week hardly to be noted at all, but now at the year's close visible and unmistakable.

The first church, of which W. F. Richardson is the loved pastor, shows a healthful growth as evidenced by increasing evening audiences, a growing endeavor work, an enlargement of Missionary receipts. Despite some retarding conditions through location, this noble church is keeping well to the front in all that makes for Christian culture. This church has about 700 resident members. The Forest Avenue Church, wrestling hitherto with financial difficulties, sees light on its way, and through heroic endeavors will soon have triumphed over all the unpitying enemy, debt. This victory assured all else is easy. Its pastor, A. W. Kokendoffer, has been with the church over nine years and each year adds to his Christian influence and power. It numbers over 900 resident members. The West Side Christian is in most hopeful mood. The work there pulses with energy. And why not? The pastor, B M. E ster, has recently quadrupled his usefulness by taking unto himself a most estimable Christian wife and his church already feels the blessing. Its membership is about three hundred. The ministry of O. P. Shrout at the South Prospect Church is satisfactory and fruitful. The church is unified, agressive, has one of the very best fields in the city and is bound to do a great work. About five hundred good men, women and children call this "our church."

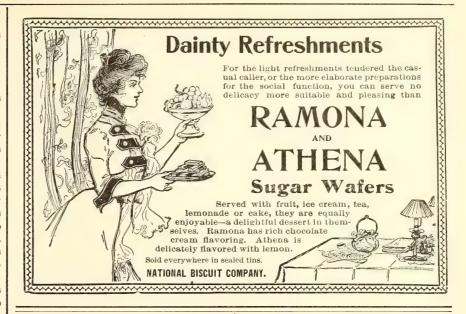

T. P. Haley is most ungrateful in that having found the Fountain of Youth he does not apprise the public of its location. He is in very truth one of the "young men" of our local ministry. Young not only in ruddy, unwrinkled face, but in hope, in aggressiveness, in buoyant service. Under his leadership the Spri gfield Avenue Church will probably dispose of its present property and remove to a more eligible and commanding site, whereby its usefulness will be greatly enlarged. The resident membership of this church is about 200. The West Park Church has had a chequered history and many discouragements. Dr. Davis, the present pastor, reports progress, however, and we hope for better things. The church numbers nearly 200.

The Sheffield church is one of our youngest. Brother Mundell is the pastor and speaks most encouragingly of the outlook. The membership is about 150.

The Sixth and Prospect Church shows a gratifying growth.

We have recently enjoyed the visits of Dr. Gates, of the Divinity House, Chicago University; Chancellor Craig, of Drake University, and George F. Hall, of Chicago. Drs. Craig and Gates not only delighted our people with strong and forceful sermons, but helped us too, we trust, in their educational propaganda. Our resident membership is about 1.000.

To this brief report of the above churches should be added a statement as to the work of our city evangelist, F. L. Bowen. Under his direction. and through his untiring work, ably seconded by his devoted wife, three mission churches have been brought almost to the point of self-support. with an aggregate membership of about 300, and having raised for all purposes during the current year over $2,000.00. These churches are known as the Vine Street Mission, the Fifteenth Street Mission and the Ivanhoe Mission. These are promising fields. Young unmarried men who can live on small salaries could, by locating with these churches, build them up in a short space of time into large and aggressive congregations, and our city evangelist could devote his energies to other strategic points. At present the churches of the city are contributing yearly about $1,000 to the support of this work.

Then there are the churches across the line separated by an invisible barrier, to be classed always with our own. E. S. Sharpe, late of Chicago, Thomas J. Dixon and T. E. Noblitt are the pastors in charge. The aggregate membership of these churches is about 900. Two additional missions there and one other also on the Missouri side looked after by the West Side church and to be noted. The additions to all our churches during the year aggregate nearly one thousand; the net gain though is much smaller. Kansas City is still alive with the twister of "birds of passage" and the permanency of the Eastern City is not yet ours. Our population is still som swhat in the nature of a procession and consequently Christian enterprise here must ever be effected by these conditions and show kaleidoscopic faces. GEORGE H. COMBS.

Texas Letter.

November 29th the "Girls' Home" at Add-Ran University. Waco, was dedicated and a joyful Thanksgiving service was held. The program called for the Thanksgiving serm in by the writer in the forencon and the dedicatory address by Hon. H. L. Ragsdale in the afternoon, but a delayed train made it necessary to reverse the order. Those who heard him pronounce his address fine—just what might have been expected from him. He plead for more liberal culture for our daughters, and he gladdened all hearts by showing that the tide is now swift and strong in that direction. His speech was enthusiastically received.

The Girls' Home was conceived less than six months since and yet it stands to day sufficiently completed to be occupied. It is a beautiful and commodious brick structure, three stories with basement, and it will be supplied with every modern comfort and convenience, so that young ladies from the best homes will find nothing of which to complain. It will cost $8,000, and thus far there is not a dollar of debt. T. E. Shirley, and the noble band which has stood by him in this enterprise, have reared a monument for themselves more beautiful and precious than gold and more durable than marble.

At three o'clock, after a delightful song service, the Thanksgiving sermon was delivered. The audience was large and full of inspiration.

If we do not misread all the signs, a better day is dawning for our school. Like most of such institutions it has had a hard struggle. Years ago Addison and Randolph Clark, brothers, inaugurated the school at Thorp Spring, and it did a good work. But in the course of time it was thought best to move it to Waco into a cent building which cost our Methodist brethren $120,000, but which we bought for $30,000 But in the removal there was not the most perfect harmony, and unfortunately a large debt was incurred. But a few friends have stood by it, and now their reward seems near. The faculty is strong and full of hope, the students are of a high grade and the people at large have become interested in the school. New students are constantly arriving and everything is on an upward grade.

At our last lectureship we inaugurated a dollar crusade in the interest of the school, asking every church in the state to give an amount equal to one dollar for each member, and this, if su cessful, will pay all debts and make some needed improvements. Several churches have already fallen into line, and it is hoped the movement will become general.

There have recently been two notable conventions in the South. The first was at Ft. Worth, Tex., and it was in the interest of ill-fated Galveston. The people of a large section of our country, much larger than Texas, are deeply interested in a Southern gateway to the sea, and they believe Galveston to be that gateway. This large convention was unanimous in a resolution calling upon the state and national governments to aid it in this hour of need. The other convention was at New Orleans, and had for its object the greatest good of the South in general. The two questions receiving special emphasis were education and the Nicaragua Canal, both of which are of vital importance. We must have better schools for our children and better facilities for selling the produce of our rich soil; and it is to the credit of this convention that these questions were discussed in the order here named.

It is not true that every woman suffers from ill health. Neither is it true that no medicine taken internally brings any relief to women suffering from ailments peculiar to their sex. It is true, however, that relief is often to be gained by the application or use of s. me remedial agent externally. The Natural Body Brace, Salina, Kan., is just what thousands of women to-day need. As its name implies, it is a brace, a natural brace, a natural body brace. A well woman could wear it and be benefited thereby, how much more one who needs the support it affords.

Is your Sunday-school using the series of supplies issued by the Christian Publishing Company? If not, why not? The overwhelming testimony of our Sunday school workers proves that they are, in every particular, the best supplies published. Why should you be content to use an inferior grade of leaflets, papers, quarterlies, etc., when you might just as well have the best?

Two thirds of all the Sunday schools among the Disciples of Christ are now using our supplies. This, of itself, is a tremendous argument for their superiority. Is your school numbered with the remaining one-third? If so, will you not investigate a little? Let us send you free samples of our supplies. An examination will convince you that our supplies are the best.

We furnish everything needed in the equipment of a first-class school-papers (three grades), lesson leaflets, quarterlies (four grades), annual commentaries (four grades), cards, maps, blackboards, record books, class books, etc., etc.

We are about to enter a new year and a new century. Suppose you start right by securing and using our Sunday-school supplies.

Chap. IX.—Some Correspondence.

The meeting was in its third week, and the folks at the fine church were in their second week. The Spirit had moved them to start a meeting just as Paul's meeting began to attract attention. They advertised converted clowns and cow-boy preachers and other attractions. Prof. Short did all he could to attract the young people. A college professor was to deliver his mighty lecture on the "Red-headed Italian." This was fixed for Friday night, that all the scholars might attend. Paul saw through this trickery, so he announced for Friday night, "The Man in the Moon."

When the night came, although it was raining, the audience was not diminished. After two weeks of this, Timothy met Rev. Mr. Evans at the station, sending his cow-boy attraction home; and he ventured to ask: "Brother Evans, how is your meeting coming on?"

"O, sir, we are doing no good. There is so much sickness and such apathy in Freedom that we cannot arouse any interest."

"Indeed?" said Timothy. "We are having good audiences all the time."

When Timothy reached his room from this accidental interview, he found two letters and the Sunrise Blade, which Paul had brought in from the post-office. Noticing by its post-mark that one was from the Bend, he hastened to open it before turning the other over to see the superscription. It was a letter from the blacksmith. It read:

"Home, March 23, 1889.

"MY DEAR BROTHER HENRY:

"I see by the Blade that you are on the rock. You cannot tell how glad I am to extend you the hand of fellowship. Now it will be easier to do the right; for the loyalty you love so well will hereafter be Lord Christ. Christ is indeed the King; and no patriotism is so loyal as patriotism to this King. You mention me kindly in your letter, as also Prof. Guthrie. I thank you for it; and the pardon you ask I cordially grant. But the most surprising thing to me is that Squire Lee came and showed me the letter before I had received my own copy. He waited till I read it and then, with tears, he took my hand and confessed that he had done me a wrong, asked me to forgive him and invited me take membership again in the church. Your letter has aroused much interest both here and at Sunrise; and I uuderstand your mother-inlaw says she has wronged you.

"Fraternally,

"JOB NORRIS."

After Timothy finished the reading of this letter aloud he looked up for remarks. "How do you feel now, as compared with your feelings then?" asked Paul.

"O, sir, I cannot express the difference. A bird liberated from a cage could not feel freer. There is joy inexpressible in just being able to quote God's Word as it reads."

As Timothy turned in his chair the other letter dropped from his lap. He snatched it up eagerly, for he recognized his mother's writing, and he would have read it first had he known it. Tearing open the envelope he read, this time not aloud:

"Covington, Ky., March 23, 1889. "MY DEAR BOY:

"I see by the papers that you have left the rock. You cannot know how sad I am over this breach of fellowship. I am sorry for the evil treatment you have received at Sunrise, and I am indignant over the slanders they have invented against you; but, O, son, are you not making the matter worse? I cannot understand how this could cause you to turn your back on the Baptist Church. What does it mean? If you have reasons, please write us, for it is costing us many would. am of course pleased to know you are well treated by your new friends, and I wish to thank Prof. Guthrie for his kindness to you; but I am sorry if he has unduly persuaded you. Timmy, have your parents ever mistreated you? We will suspend judgment till we hear from you. "Faithfully,

"Your Mother."

The young man cried a little over this letter and read it aloud. With tears still glistening in his eyes he broke into a rippling laugh. "See here, Paul. The two letters bear the same date; and begin with two uses of the same words. Bless her dear heart! I will answer her this afternoon. She shall know the truth, and the truth will make her free."

"Freedom, March 25, 1889.

"MY OWN DEAR MOTHER:

"Your letter arrived just now, and it is not easy to describe the emotions it has produced. I love you and father as devotedly as always, and it is impossible for me to say you have ever mistreated me. But in this step I did not think of you. I was too eager to please my Savior. I feel sure you would rather I pleased him than you. Indeed, it is partially your Christian instruction that has prompted me to do as I have done.

"' 'What can it mean?'

"It means, mother mine, that the Christian Church is free from the weaknesses that remain with the Missionary Baptists. In casting off the fossilizing vagaries of the order the missionary branch became active and progressive and fruitful. But they retained some practices that are impractical and unscriptural. In the Luzon meeting my preceptor, Mr. Guthrie, discussed the power of man to determine one whole side of the problem of hunan salvation. He made much of the fact that man is made in God's image; and that, since 'God is a Spirit,' as the Savior asserted, the image must be a spiritual image; and man's will is just like the will of God, only limited in degree. Can there be any doubt of the correctness of this reasoning? And is it not in vivid contrast with all we ever taught at the Bend? It makes us akin to God. I can see why God is displeased by rebellion; and how obedience means some thing in human salvation. I always believed this; but I feared to announce it lest I compromise the character of God. Now I see it harmonizes with all the Savior and the apostles have given us in the way of invitation, exhortation and warning.

"Mother, did you know that the Baptists have to trim and hedge certain Scriptures or leave them wholly unused? I, once in my short life, assisted in excluding a noble Christian gentleman because he would not agree to quit using Acts 2:38. Turn to that, mother, and see how much freer a man may be to use that verse outside the Baptist ranks

"One other matter which this brother has cleared up for me is the process of receiving sinners' confessions. Of the thirty-nine accessions we reached in the great Luzon meeting, about twenty-five were from the world

"Brother Guthrie just asked: 'Do you believe in Christ Jesus as the Son of God and the Savior of mankind?' This is so like the process described in the New Testament, and so unlike your gauntlet of examination, that any lover of good order must be impressed by it.

"Yesterday we were reading the story of the Philippian jailer, and I noticed an application of this very matter. The apostle said, 'Believe in the Lord Jesus.' If he had been a Baptist he would have said: 'Silas, hustle out and find a quorun of brethren to vote whether this sinner will do to baptize or not.' And the chariot scene, and the baptism of Lydia and that of Cornelius would in like manner have been seriously delayed

"No, mother! These people are right and we were wrong in these simple matters; and I had not heard more than four of this preacher's sermons before I saw where my trouble lay. I was trying to be loyal to criteria that are not justified by the Word of God. Its amazing simplicity struck me; and I had only one difficulty remaining in my way to prevent affiliation with them; that was their supposed 'open' communion. But in a moment Paul showed me that neither open nor close communion is taught in the Bible. All any preacher has a right to say is, 'Let a man examine himself and so let him eat.'

"Who was I that I should withstand matters so simple and so Scrip ural? Believe me, I have never felt so like a soldier, or so loyal in my citizenship as now. This, then, is what it means.

"Looking back over your questions, I perceive that I have answered them all. And, as my letter is too long, I will close with best love to you and father.

"Faithfully yours, as ever, "TIMOTHY."

A Wise Decision.

A German boy was reading a blood-and-thunder novel. Right in the midst of it he said to himself: "Now, this will never do I get too much excited over it. I can't study so well after it. So here goes!" and he flung the book into the river. He was Fichte, the great German philosopher.

Lonely Hours of a Bereaved Mother.

BY H. M. DODGE.

And I am left! There is a strange delight In counting o'er one's bitterness, to cull A flower of comfort from it. I am left To bear the gathering storms of life, my child, Still tempest-toss'd upon its dangerous seas, While thou art safely moor'd; thy little barque Is anchor'd in the haven where the winds Of sorrow never blow; thy star has risen In climes of peace and love, to set no more Forever and forever All thy life Was like a rosebud—like a gentle breath Of purest fragrance, wafted on the wing Of early zephyr—like the opening ray Of morning's softest blush. Thy little heart Had never tasted woe. Thy infant breast Was heaven's own dwelling place; it never knew The touch of aught gave innecence and love. Blessed child,

Thy lot on earth was bright, and now thou art With holy angels. I will cease to mourn! O! had I loved thee less, my foolish heart Had sighed to keep thee in this changing world, Had fastened thee to life, till thou had'st drain'd Its very dregs of woe! Never, O! never Could I have knelt, and kissed the chastening rod With such unfeign'd submission! Never, never Could I have looked so calmly on the smile Thy parting spirit left, had my fond soul Less dotingly hung o'er thee in thy life, Less proudly treasured up thy darling name In the deep recess of my heart! But now Our very lives were one! There could not be A deeper, purer tenderness than heaved This trembling breast for thee. How could I then, Ask aught forth e but happiness? In life. When thou west closely folded in these arms, And I did feel thy warm breath on my cheek, Thy smiling eyes fixed tenderly on mine, My prayers were full of pleading-agonies Almost, of earnestness, that heaven would bless Thy opening day with joy, and every good That might be deemed most proper. O! are not Those prayers most fully answered? Could my soul,

In all its deepest gush of tenderness Have asked a holier boon, a blessedness More durable, more infinite and pure, More like the nature of a God to give, Than heaven's own self, with all its blessed ones, Its high society, its holy love, Its rapturous songs of gratitude and praise, Its pure celestial streams and f uits and flowers, And glorious light reflected from the face Of God's beloved Son: could I have claimed Of God's beloved Son: could I have claimed A higher boon, my precious babe, for thee? And then again, to be exempt from woe And human suffering, forever free From all the tolls, and pains, and nameless cares That gather with our years, and ob! perchance, At last a hopeless death! O! I could weep With very gratitude that thou art saved, Thy soil forever saved. What though my heart Should bed at overy poor till thou art bleet. Should bleed at every pore, till thou art blest. There is an hour, my precious innocent, When we shall meet again! O! may we meet To separate no more! Yes, I can smile, And sing with gratitude, and weep with joy, Even while my heart is breaking!

Advantages of Polygamy.

It is difficult to decide who are the most beautiful women. In the streets of Budapest and in Irish dining-rooms the greatest beauty exists. If the law of my country made polygamy compulsory, says Max O'Rell, I would make love to an English women or a fair daughter of Virginia; I would have my house kept by a German wife; my artistic inclinations I would trust to a French woman; my intellectual ones to an American. Then when life got a little dull and I wanted my blood stirred up, I would call on my Spanish wife. I would get it .- Christian Commonwealth.

Punished Enough Already.

A very subdued-looking boy of about eleven years, with a long scratch on his nose and an air of general dejection, came to his teacher and handed her a note before taking his seat and becoming deeply absorbed in his book. The note read as follows: "Miss B---: Please excuse James for not being thare yesterday. He played trooant, but you don't need to lick him for it, as the boy he played trooant with and him fell out and the boy licked him, and a man they sassed caught and licked him, and the driver of a cart they hung on to licked him also. Then his pa licked him, and I had to give him another one for sassing me for telling his pa, so you need not lick him till next time. He thinks he better keep in school now." Under the circumstances the teacher thought James had been punished enough.—The American Boy.

Confucius Dumbfounded.

In the good old days when people deemed the world flat, Confucius plodded hither and thither with philosophy on the tip of his tongue, and wise answers for every query of young and old. Once he chanced upon two boys of ten years who were using high words. Said he benignly to the two lads, raising his hands in a gesture of rebuke and interest, "What may be, O, little ones, the cause of your clamor?" Introducing himself, he inquired further, "Will you be pleased to cease your dispute while I expound to you my system of clear reasoning?"

"Gladly," replied the lads in concert, casting themselves at the feet of the good sage. "Often have our ears been honored with the Mighty yet Sweet Sound of your Marvelous Name, O, Most Lustrous Pearl of Unsurpassed Knowledge."

"Then," continued Confucius, "present to

Bowing low, the first boy made answer: "I hold, O, Incarnate Wisdom, that the distance between this spot and the horizon is greater than the distance from here to the top of the sky, for the reason that when I hurried to school this morning at the rising of the sun, the air was as chill as the Hoang in winter, while now the sun is at the top of the sky, and I feel as hot as though I were locked in my mother's oven. When the sun is distant, I am cool; when it is near, I am hot; therefore, O, Botttomless Ocean of Learning, the base is greater than the altitude."

Gave forth the second boy, bowing lower than his companion had done: "I am certain, O, Quintessence of the Wisdom of All Ages, that the distance between this place and the summit of the sky-dome is longer than the base distance mentioned by my erring playmate, because when I journeyed to school this morning, with the sun just appearing in the east, the Golden Lily of the Sky was of the bigness of a wheel, while at this present moment it is as small as the mouth of my rice-bowl. An object is great when it is near, small when far away, therefore, O, Hope of Philosophy, the distance between this spot and the top of the sky is greater by far than the base."

With a tremendous sigh, Confucius shook his head and silently walked away. - Chautauquan.

Helps in Emergencies.

Prompt action in cases of accidental poisoning has often saved life, and to have some knowledge of the best methods of treatment is a great comfort and perhaps the following simple antidote, from an excellent physician, will be found useful in cases of emergency.

The first thing to do in cases of poisoning is to produce vomiting, so as to eject the poison from the stomach. Mustard, salt and water (lukewarm water), about a cup full with a little soda in it, as an active emetic may be given.

For external poisons, such as poison ivy and Virginia creeper poison or other plants, bathe the affected parts in a strong solution of borax-water; then apply a poultice made of tansy leaves moistened with sweet cream. The borax is cooling, a sedative and kills disease germs or poison. For corrosive sublimate or poisons from alkalies, lead, or mushroom, vinegar and oil should be given freely. For cases where the cause is not known, it will be found safe to give an emetic followed by a stimulant in sweet milk.

For an inflamed eye, a teaspoonful of boracic acid to a pint of water, to which add a bit of gum of camphor. For hoarseness or tickling in the throat, place a small quantity of dry borax on the tongue and let it slowly dissolve and run down the throat. For a cough or sore throat one of the best simple remedies is a solution of borax and salt, a pretty strong one, and gargle often with it; if you happen to swallo a little of it, so much the bester, it won't hurt you.

For a burn or bruise, or a cut, also bathe the parts in a strong solution of borax water. It is wonderfully cooling and does not hurt like balsam or camphor.

PETE.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

VII.-How Pete Escaped.

After the tramp had slipped over the back fence, Pete went into the house. Breakfast was nearly ready. "Pete," said her mother, "where have you been? I have sent Madge everywhere, looking for you."

"Oh," said the little girl, "I didn't want to stay in bed, and it was so pleasant outdoors -and the dew was like rain it was so heavy, so I just went all over the place, and I've got such an appetite that if it was to grow much more it would be too big for me!" Now, every word Pete had spoken was the truth, but she didn't tell near all of the truth; as we know. For her real object had been to have an interview with the tramp. She couldn't stay in bed, indeed! Just listen at that! Of course she couldn't. But why? Because she had been so eager to see Nap and beg him to stay away from their barn! And she didn't tell her mother a word about Nap. She did wrong in just telling a little piece of the truth, hiding all the important part. For my part, I wish she had spoken out and told everything. But no little girl is perfect. Now you watch and see if something unpleasant doesn't happen to Pete for the way she did! She and Madge started off to school together. Jennie, being a young lady and a senior, didn't have to go so early. On the way Pete told Madge everything about Nap; how he had asked her to come alone the next morning with all her pretty things and Madge's pretty things, and Jennie's, and he would have a look at them, and maybe he would take them and go away, and not stay for the hundred dollars.

"Oh Pete!" cried Madge. "How could you have the courage to be all alone in the loft with that wicked man?"

"I gaess," said Pete, "some people are born with c urage in them, just like some have music born in 'em, so they don't have to say 'one-two-three-four,' when they play the piano. I guess you was born with both left out of you."

"I have to say 'one-two-three-four,' " returned Madge. "My teacher makes me. My opinion is, some girls are born with a bad streak in 'em, and that's what I've often thought of Miss Prudence."

"Oh, have you?" returned Pete. "Thanks! And I guess you won't be glad if I make Nap go away!"

"What could I give him?" mused Madge. "There is my silver bracelet with five silver hearts on it and one gold heart."

"My bracelet has two hearts," said Pete. "And I have that ring cousin Mollie gave me. I'd give him everything I've got to make him go away and not make mamma so sad and worried. Wouldn't you?"

"Yes I would, Pete! I believe she's going to have a spell of sickness and that would be worse than the hundred dollars."

"Yes it would! Oh Madge, do you think Jennie will give her little gold watch?"

"Jennie? I tell you what, Pete, you'd better not tell Jennie anything about this. If you do she'll be sure to tell mamma, and mamma'll stop the whole thing."

"No, Jennie won't tell," cried Pete, "We'll beg her not to. You and I haven't enough booty of our own. Jennie has to throw in, too."

"Better not tell her," warned Madge. "She always thinks she has to tell mamma everything, like all grown-up people do. It's their way." Just then they met Letitia and Linda

May. "Girls," said Linda May, "did you find any more candy in your boxes this morning?"

"No," said Madge, "we're not going to leave out our box any more. We don't want to encourage that wicked tramp. He thinks he can buy us with his candy and then do as he pleases in his meanness."

"I left out my box," said Letitia, "and I found a nickel's worth of butterscotch in it, too."

"Le's see it," said Linda May.

"I ate it up. What did you find, Linda

May?"
"Nothing. Aunt Dollie watches me so since I hid Lucifer in the storm-cellar that I don't get a chance to put out my box. But was it flat, light-yellow butterscotch, or darkyellow rolls, wrapped in tissue paper?"

"Long, round bars," said Letitia.

"I like that kind," said Linda May.

"So do I," said Madge.

"Didn't you save any?" asked Pete; "just a little tine-sy speck?"

Letitia shook her head. "I wish I had," she said, "so I could eat it now."

"Oh, thank you!" cried Madge. They all laughed and went into the school house to put their books on their desks. Then they came out and joined other girls in playing, "What's your trade?-Lemonade!" and, until the bell rang, they forgot that there were any troubles in the world.

When school was over, Pete walked home with Jennie, and told her about her conversation with the tramp. "Why, Pete!" cried Jennie. "Didn't you know better than to trust yourself with such a creature up there in the loft? And you are to go back in the morning? It can never be allowed. Besides he would just take our things and still wait for the hundred dollars."

"All right," said Pete, "then how do you know but when he gets the hundred dollars but he will wait for a thousand?"

"Pete, I must tell mamma about this. I am so sorry, but this cannot be kept secret from her."

"Go and tell on me, then. You always say you are sorry. I believe you like it! Oh, Jennie, please don't tell. Just when I am going to get rid of him, too!" Pete began to cry, but Jennie was firm. She thought her mother ought to know, and she was sure that Pete ought not to be alone with that tramp. "You have done very wrong, Prudence," said her mother, some time later. When her mother said "Prudence," Pete knew what was coming. "When I asked you

FAT BABY

Fat is the cushion that nature fills out and surrounds the little ones with, to protect their tender parts—the same with kittens and puppies—fat is not tender. Fat they must have; and fat they must be.

where you had been, you hid from me the truth: and hiding the truth is the same as telling a lie. I believe your intentions were good in going to see that man, but you should have asked my consent. I would have forgiven you that, however, if you had not lied about it afterwards." Mrs. Morris never used the word, "lie," in this sense, except on the rare occasions when her children violated or suppressed the truth. It made Pete wince every time she heard it. So Pete was locked up in her bed room, upstairs, although it was four o'clock and a Friday afternoon; and there she must stay without a bite of food until the next morning! That was Mrs. Pete threw herself on the Morris' plan. bed and cried and cried, and, if you insist upon particulars, kicked. The afternoon wore away with awful slowness. She thought of Letitia. She and Letitia always played great games Friday after school, and planned for the next day. And what would Nap think when she didn't come the next morning? Listen! Who was that on the front porch? Pete scrambled to the window; her mother, Madge and Jennie, all "dressed up" and going out visiting. Oh, yes, they were going to visit Miss Dollie Dudley! Just think! And Madge would play with Linda May in the storm cellar. She saw her mother lock the front door. Madge lagged behind her mother and Jennie, and suddenly turning, spied Pete at her tower of observation. Madge formed four words with her lips, and then spelled them on her fingers—"I told you so!" Yes, Madge had been right; Jennie ought never to have been told! You see the moral Pete drew from this affair. When they were out of sight, O, how hungry Pete suddenly became! And she must starve till morning! It must be at least half-past four. She tried to remember what she had eaten for dinner, but the time was too remote. Pete went to her back window,—the room looked north and south,-and right in the garden she could see ripe tomatoes and cucumbers and grapes,—it was September. She looked at them. They seemed to look at her. She wandered back to her front winand discovered Edgar Brown slowly pacing the sidewalk. A sudden and desperate resolve leaped up in Pete's breast. "Mr. Brown!" she called. "Come in here, under my window. I want to tell you something!'

W. F. RICHARDSON.

TESUS ANOINTED AT BETH-ANY.*

Much has been made by some commentators of the differences in the narratives of this beautiful event, as given by Matthew and Mark on the one hand, and John on the other. Some even hold the theory that the two accounts are of different events. But an examination of the context will explain some of these divergences, and circumstances easily imagined will remove other objections to their identity. Matthew and Mark, in the verses immediately preceding those of this lesson had referred to the plot that was forming among the scribes and chief priests against the life of Jesus, and how they were delayed in carrying it out because of the multitudes of Jesus' friends who were present at the feast. This reminds them of the agreement already entered into between these enemies of Jesus and his false disciple, Jadas, and they turn back from the course of their story to tell of the supper at Bethany, where the evil purpose was formed in the heart of the traitor. John, on the other hand, tells the story in its proper place, and gives us more details, and his narrative would better have been chosen for our lesson. He tells of the presence of Lazarus and his sisters, and that it was Mary herself who anointed the Lord, and how she poured the oil on his feet, and wiped them with her hair. It has been often noted that the earlier evangelists, Matthew and Mark, make no reference to Lazarus or his sisters; and it has been conjectured, we think with much reason, that at the time they wrote, the circumstances of the family were such that it would cause them serious embarrassment to call public attention to the interesting facts of which they were the center. John, writing a great many years later, perhaps after the death of them all, could give these personal details without drawing down upon these faithful friends of Jesus any persecution from his enemies. The two evangelists say that the supper was in the house of Simon the leper. He was someone, probably, whom Jesus had healed of this dread malady, and his home would be gladly opened to honor the guest to whom he owed all that was worth living for. Martha aided in the service of the feast, John tells us, but Lazarus was a guest, and a notable one, too, for he was looked upon with awe, as one who, for four days, had viewed the mysteries of the spirit world, concerning which his lips maintained ever a strange silence. What thoughts surged through the heart of Mary, the gentle and spiritual maiden, who was wont to forget all else in hanging upon the golde words of the Master, we may not know. But it is manifest that what Jesus had said about his coming death at Jerusalem had made a far deeper impression on her than on even his apostles. Her heart was full of grief, that he who had proven himself the holiest of men and the truest of friends to all, should die as a malefactor. The shadow deepened over her soul. How could the thoughtless multitude feast when their Lord was on the way to the cross? She could endure the strain no longer. Her love and grief must find expression. She had one treasure, provided and kept for some occasion of sacred import. It was an alabaster vase of precious ointment, spikenard, costing not less than three hundred denarii, a sum equal to nearly fifty dollars in our currency, and with a purchasing power at that time of three hundred dollars. Coming hastily into the room, regardless of the crowd that watched her movements, Mary broke the vase, and poured its contents first upon the head, and then the feet, of the Savior. The fragrance floated through the room, telling how valuable was this lavish gift of love. Seeing the cintment dripping from Jesus' feet upon the floor, Mary stooped and wiped his feet with her hair; and the disciples remembered that other day, at the house of the other Simon, the Pharisee, in Capernaum, when the sinful woman from the street wept over the feet of Jesus, and covered them with kisses. So did the Master receive gladly the tribute of love, whether it came from the heart of the chief of sinners or from that of a sweet young saint like Mary of Bethany.

Alas that this scene had to be marred by the avarice and greed of an ungrateful disciple! Judas, who carried the bag that held the small bits of money belonging to the group of disciples, was already a thief, and had been pilfering from the scanty store entrusted to him. And here was at least a hundred pence, enough to keep one for many months, wasted in one act of pure sentiment. His murmurs were echoed by others of the disciples, and poor Mary felt the indignant glances of the company centered upon her. She looked with startled eyes at the face of Jesus. His eyes met hers with gentle and loving approval, and then turned with mingled grief and indignation toward the disciples. "You will ever have the poor with you, and can do them good when you will. I shall be with you but a few more days, and any love you would show me must be quickly manifested. Mary hath wrought a good work upon me. She hath understood me better than you, and hath brought this cintment to prepare me for my burial. Her deed shall never be forgotten. Wherever the story of my death is told, there shall her love be recounted, and the fragrance of this cintment shall linger upon her name forever."

No wonder that covetousness and avarice are denounced in the Scriptures. They dwarf the soul and dry up every spring of noble motive. Mary thought three hundred pence not too much to give as an expression of her grateful love. Judas counted one-third as much a sufficient price to put upon the life of his Lord. A selfish economy is remembered only to be execrated, while a lavish love is recalled with admiration and imitation. Greed will make any excuse, even the needs of the poor, to avoid generous giving. The soul that will not offer its larger gifts to the Lord will not make the smaller gifts to men. The poor of Nazareth had vastly more to hope for from wasteful Mary than from prudent Judas. There is a false economy that dish mors God and neglects humanity; while love will pour out its benefactions without

From this scene of contrasted avarice and love Judas hastens forth to bargain away the life of his Lord. An exhibition of love will either soften the heart or harden it. Even the gospel savour of life and a savour of death. The story of Mary's tribute may render us more loving or more selfish, as we imbibe her spirit, or criticize her act. God help us to bring our heart's best

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the sys-

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and odorous vegeta-

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and taroat from the poison of catarrh

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of thes + lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in the stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordidary charcoal tablets."

TOPIC FOR JANUARY 6.

A FORWARD LOOK.

(Phil. 3:12-14.)

It is not at all a bad idea to stop and look back now and again; but this should only be for taking breath, or for meditating which way to press forward.

He who looks back in self-congratulation is like that Irishman who thanked God for every mile he went since that added one mile to what was behind him and took off one mile from what was before him, so that his total progress was two miles. This is a sublime optimism, but it must be confessed it is not a true estimate of one's work; though there are many of us who are just that foolish in self-gratulation.

MOn the other hand, he who looks back with perpetual grumblings and misgivings, with selfcondemnation and with remorse over shortcomings, is not likely to go forward with a heart strong for any fate.

Hence it is far better to spend little time, even at New Year's, in looking back; and much better, after a single glance, to put the best foot foremost and walk ahead. Motion is the necessary thing in any undertaking. A sermon, a story, a song, a symphony, many of the best works of art, must have motion. So, a life, that highest form of art, should have motion, activity, the forward look and Paul was not the man to pause and look back for any reason. He was constantly doing and planning larger and better things. There are so many people who are willing to rest on their laurels; so many who say, "I'm better already than Mr. So and So. Let well enough alone;" so many churches who say, "See what an excellent church we are already, no need to get larger offerings or add this or that to our work; we do more than our neighbors now." The church or person who stands still in spiritual things is dving.

What should Endeavorers look forward to, in 1901, the first year of a great new century? There is a great pleasure, always, in having something to look forward to. Especially do young folks desire to have some pleasure ahead of which they can think, to break the monotony of daily work in school or elsewhere. It used often to be argued in debating clubs, "Is there more pleasure in pursuit than in possession?" What can we anticipate for Christian Endeavor?

- 1. That there is sure to be a greater maturity in our movement. We cannot forever keep the same age, thank God. With greater maturity comes a greater calm, and perhaps a greater poise, less demonstration.
- 2. That there should be no diminution in real enthusiasm. It is enthusiasm, either quiet or overflowing, that is the great motive force of the world's movements.
- 3. That there should be an increase in the older societies of members from the Junior to the Intermediate Societies to bring new freshness and If there are difficulties in coalescence, let it not be through fault of the older members.
- There should be an increasing co-operation with the societies of other churches, and therefore an added emphasis on Christian Unity.
- There should be wider reading on religions and other subjects.
- 6. There shou'd be a more intelligent, thorough and regular study of the Bible.

These are a few of the things to which we can look forward. They may not fit all societies. Some may have already "apprehended," but most of us probably cannot count ourselves yet to have apprehended. Other suggestions will readily

A REMARKABLE INVENTION

BY AN OHIOAN.

A prominent business man of Cincinnati has invented a new Vapor Bath Cabinet that has proven a blessing to every man, woman and child who has used it; and as many of our readers may not know of its real comfort and blessings we illustrate it in this issue

This Cabinet is an air-tight, rubber-walled room, in which one comfortably rests on a chair, and, with only the head outside, enjoys all the cleansing, curative, beautifying and invigorating effects of the Astonishing is the improvement in health, feeling and complexion by the use of this Cabinet, and it seems to us that the long-sought-for method of securing a clear skin, a good complexion, of retaining good health, curing and preventing disease without drugs, has certainly been found.

The makers inform the writer that more than 600,000 of these Cabinets have been sold, and showed letters from thousands of users who speak of this Cabinet as giving perfect satisfaction.

A. B. Stockham, M. D., of Chicago, editor of "Tokology," recommends it highly, as also does Congressman John J. Lentz, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, Rev. C. M. Keith, editor "Holiness Advocate;" Mrss. ARNOLD'S FRACTICAL SABBATH-SCHOOL COMMEN-TARY on the International Lessons for 1901. Mrs. T. B. Arnold, editor. Fleming H. Revell Co.

This well-known commentary, which has been issued in the same form of several years, preserves, in its treatment for the lessons of 1901 those qualities which have hitherto made it popular. The omission of the illustrations would improve it.

THE CANTEEN IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY. By William T. F. Ferguson. The New Voice Press. Chicago.

This is perhaps the most complete available summary of facts and testimonies in regard to the army canteen. The facts themselves constitute an irrefutable argument for the abolition of the canteen. The argument would be still stronger if the author, who is managing editor of the New Voice, would abandon this habitual denunciatory tone. In that case the mass of the people, who are not at the start profoundly interested in the canteen question, would be less tempted to discount the whole thing as can paign exaggeration. The facts are not to be discounted and they should be told in a manner! which will give them the widest possible credence.

FORBIDDEN PATHS IN THE LAND OF CG: A Record of the Travels of Three Wise and Otherwise Mento the East of the Jordan River. By the Otherwise Man. Fleming R. Revell Co., Chicago. $1.25.

An unusual book of travel. Three missionaries, young, energetic, enthusiastic and resourceful. make a journey into the little known land east of Palestine, the ancient kingdom of Bashan over which Og ruled in the days when the children of Israel passed through on their pilgrimage up from Egypt. The writer disclaims for himself and his companions all similitude to the conventionalized missionary whose picture is found on the cover of the missionary magazines-"the serious and sedate gentleman clad] in flowing ministerial garb, with broad-brimmed[hat, lorg white beard and an open book in his left hand, who is earnestly exhorting an all-absorbed gathering of half-clad savages who have laid aside their spears and wicker shields in their great desire to drink in the elequent words of the preacher." A journey in the land[of]Og[is not to be made by a Cook's excursion and generally it is difficult to get the necessary governmental permission to make it at all. In this case the adventurous missionaries went without permission and the quasi-illegality of the expedition gives it an added charm to the reader as it probably did to the travelers. There is enough good! description to make the book instructive and enough racy narrative to make it highly readable.

THE REAL CHINESE QUESTION. By Chester Holcombe. Dodd, Mead & Co. New York. $150.

Among the many recent volumes on the Chinese situation, there is perhaps none which contributes more to an intelligent and dispassionate comprehension of the real points at issue than this book by the former interpreter, Secretary of Legation and Acting United States Minister at Pekin. Mr. Holcombe is a sympathetic student of Chinese character. He believes that the Chinese are not a decadent race, that their opposition to foreign innovation is not due to bigotry and superstition, that the empire is not in a condition of anarchy. He shows that much of the trcuble has arisen from treating the Chinese as children, from imposing upon them, from falling to take account of their ideas of diplomatic [etiquette, which are diferent from those of the west though rerhaps quite as reasonable. The work of the missionaries. he says, has not been the cause of bad feeling. Using for the most part the historical method, the author treats of the Chinese Literati, Chinese Societies, Chinese Army and Navy, the Missionary Diplomacy in China, Chinese Opinions of Foreigners, the Opium Trade, Foreign Aggression, the Partition of China, Reform in China. The real Chinese question, he says, is the question of the continued existence of the Chinese nation. "Left largely to herself, encouraged where encouragement is necessary, warned and guided at times in any kindly and friendly way and helped to help herself" China will develop for herself a worthy future. She has sinned much, but she has also been much sinned against.

THE COBRA'S DEN, and Other Stories of Missionary Work Among the Telugus of India. By Rev. Jacob Chamberlain, M. D., D. D. Fleming H. Revell Company. Chicage. $1.

In the ccurse of his forty years of missionary labor in scuthern India, Dr. Chamberlain has had a vast number of remarkable and thrilling experiences. Many of these he has already told in his earlier volume, "In the Tiger Jungle," and many more he puts into this book. They are rousing good stories of adventure, quite apart from their value as showing the characteristics of an important missionary field. There are not many books which appeal equally to the half-grown boy, who is in the period when he delights in stories of pirates and Indians and hairbreadth escapes, and also to the doctor of divinity; but this is one of them. It will be a good addition to any missionary library.

A PR'SONER IN BUFF. By Everett T. Tomlinson. American Baptist Publication Society. Philadelphia.

This is a sprightly story of revolutionary times, well written and sufficiently full of incident to keep up the interest. It will speal particularly to young readers. The author introduces an unusual amount of bare historical narrative, but this does not impede the movement of the story and will be instructive for the readers for whom it is intended. It has the somewhat rare distinction of being a tale which involves no love story.

ALICE OF OLD VINCENNES. By Maurice Thompson. The Bowen Merrill Co. Indianapolis. $1.50.

Mr. Thompson has chosen for the setting of his story a field which has large possibilities for romance. Indiana in revolutionary days was on the far frontier and was peopled by Indians and Creoles. The Creoles for the most part sympathized with the colonists in their struggle for liberty, while the Indians were the allies of the British. The sober history of this period, as related by such a consummate historian as Parkman or such artless narrators as the writers of the voluminous Jesuit Relations, is in itself a romance. The author has chosen for his central episode the capture of Vincennes by the British under Colonel Hamilton and its recapture by the Americans under General Clark. He has shown well the character of that border warfare and the influence of Jamaica rum and French Christianity in controlling the Indians of Indiana. The value of Mr. Thompson's accomplishment lies not in his technical skill as a literary artist, for the style, while reasonably adequate to the matter in hand, is not conspicuously meritorious, but in the discovery of an admirable historical background and the creation of one splendid and original character. Alice is well worthy of her position as the central figure in a strong historical novel. The unflinching impartiality with which the author reveals the shortcomings of his heroine (as in the chapter "Clark Advises Alice") and gives the British commander Hamilton full credit for such virtues as were mingled with his conspicuous vices, suggests that if he should turn his attention to the writing of sober history, he would probably write it fairly and judicially.

The Hicks' Almanae for 1901 has just been issued. It is known to most of our readers that Mr. Hicks predicts storms a year in advance by reference to the positions of the planets. We don't profess to know how he does it, but he certainly hirs it about as often as the other forecasters miss, and that gives a large balance in his favor. His prediction of the Galveston storm was particularly noteworthy. (Word and Works Publishing Company, St. Louis, Mo. $.25).

A Remarkable Coincidence.

May there not be to us something at least suggestive in the fact that Christmas is celebrated on the 25th of December? It is the first day in the year when the days begin to lengthen. For three days past they have been nearly at a standstill. But Christmas day is a trifle longer than the day that preceded it.

From this time forward, for months, the days will grow longer and the nights shorter. The first Christmas morning said to the world's night: "Henceforth you must decrease while the day must increase." From that time to this Christianity has been taking little by little, gradually, from the world's night and adding it to the world's day; and this is to continue until the darkness is swallowed up in the universal shining of the Sun of Righteousness.

ON FOOD, AFTFR BEING GIVEN UP.

Lack of knowledge regarding the kind of food to give to people, particularly invalids, frequently causes much distress, whereas when one knows exactly the kind of food to give to quickly rebuild the brain and nerve centers, that knowledge can be made use of.

A young Chicago woman says: "Other instances of the wonderful qualities possessed by Grape-Nuts food are shown in my grandmother's and mother's cases. Grandmother's entire left side became totally paralyzed, from a ruptured capillary of the brain. The doctor said it would be impossible for her to live a week. She could not take ordinary food and we put her on Grape-Nuts, in an effort to do all for her we could.

"To the astonishment of the dootor and the delight of all of us, she slowly rallied and recovered It was pronounced the first case of the kind on record. The doctor said nothing could have produced this result but food.

"We had been led to use Grape Nuts because of the effect on mother. She has been troubled with a weak stomach all her life, and the last few years been gradually losing weight and strength. She has tried everything, almost, that has been recommended by good authority, and until she used Grape-Nuts food, nothing seemed to do her any good. Since taking up Grape-Nuts she has been constantly improving until now she is free from any of the stomach troubles, and is strong and well. Please do not publish my name." PRIGMORE.

Benjamin Prigmore died on Dec. 16, 1900, at the residence of Wood Dickinson, his son in law, near Dunksburg, Pettis Co., Mo. Born Seps. 14, 1811, in Bourbon Co, Ky., he came with his paren s to Missouri in 1818, and set led near the present site of Sweet Springs, Mo. Missouri was then a wild, unsettled territory, and the was then a wild, unsettled territory, and early pioneers endured many privations and dangers in preparing the way for civilization. Brother Prigmore grew to manhood without schools, newspapers or books. In 1843 out schools, newspapers or books. In 1843 he was married to Mary S. Wingfield, who died Feb. 3, 1847. May 17, 1848, he was again married, to Mildred Jane Taylor, who died March 11, 1899. Bro. Prigmore left behind him three sons:
Harrison, of Bates Co., Mayor M. F. Prigmore, of Sweet Springs, and Wm., of Dunisburg, and one daughter, Mrs. Wood Dickinson, at whose house he died. From early manhood Bro. Prigmore was a member of the Christian Church and for the last forty years was one of the elders of Mt. Zion Church at Dunksburg, Mo. Though denied the advantages of schools in his early life, he was a man of strong, rugged common sense, and by application to study in later life became well informed on all practical questions. As a Christian he was content to rest his hope on old truths and had scant patience with speculative preaching. He held with a strong grip to the cardinal principles of the Current Reformation and was for nearly two generations faithfully devoted to its propagation. The memory of his fidelity as an elder of Mt. Zion Church will be to that church a sacred benediction. Few men had more decided views nor did any have more friends. At his burial hundreds who had known him from infancy as an elder, and as the friend of parents now in heaven, came to drop a tear on his coffin and see his strong, benevolent face for the last time. The writer, who had known him from infancy and at whose feet he had done his first preaching, talk dat his funeral. A good and true man has gone from earth and men to meet his God and Savior. To his children and friends I commend the grace of God in hone of heaven.

SMITH.

George Stanford Smith died at his residence in San Jose, Cal., on Nov. 26, of heart trouble, induced by dropsy, at the age of 55. I have known Bro. Smith since his father moved from his Illinois farm to Abingdon in 1864, that his family might have the advantage of college training. From the first he showed great ability as a speaker and it was the great desire of his friends that he enter the ministry, but he chose the law. He soon rose to prominence in his profession in Plattsmouth, Neb. President Hays appointed him surveyor-general of Nebraska, after which he became attorney for the city of Omaha. He was one of the attorneys of the Burlington road. Bro. Smith's constitution giving way, he sought California five years ago and his health so improved that he opened a law office in Monterey. About six months ago they settled in San Jose. He was a man of strong faith and had no fears of death. He leaves a son, Guy W., a daughter, Georgie, and a faithful wife. The body was cremated at "Cyprus Lawn," and the ashes will be placed under the family monument in Plattsmouth, Neb.

J. DURHAM.

STEWART.

E. Taylor Stewart was born November 11, 1849, and died November 3, 1900. He obeyed the gospel and was baptized by the writer about thirty years ago. He was married to Jennie Cox, and two sons were born to them. He entered Christian University in the early nineties when the writer was President, and after leaving school he preached at Holsington, Kan. He served also as mayor of that town and held other offices. His last work was to debate with an Adventist. He broke down in the midst of the debate, and died in about ten days at Topeka, where he was taken for treatment. He was a great lover of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and was a constant reader of it for many years.

Brother Stewart was an excellent citizen, a constant friend, a devoted brother, a loving husbond, a fond father, a thorough student, a good preacher and a model Christian. He was the very soul of honor. SIMPSON ELY. very soul of honor.

WENCHEL.

Mrs. Rebecca Wenchel was born in Chester Co., Pennsylvania, April 4. 1822, died Dec. 8, 1900, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. J. M. Frost, at Princeton, Mo. She reached the advanced age of Princeton, Mo. She reached the advanced age of 78 years, 8 months and 4 days. She was a member of the Christian Church for 35 years and in all its mighty communion none honored her profession more highly than she. For many years her greatest comfort has been found in her Bible and the Christian Evangelist. She greatly admired the spirit in which Bro. Garrison treats men who differ from him, and his "musings" in his 'Easy Chair" were comforting to her more than our feeble words can tell. We conducted the our feeble words can tell. We conducted the fuveral service from the home of her daughter and son in-law, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Acre, near Unionville in Putnam County. She richly merited the love of her children, the respect of her neighbors and the reward of the finally faithful.

"Just the thing!" is what they say of our announcement of the adoption of the instalment plan in our Book Department. During 1900 our constant effort has been to make it easy for our patrons to secure good books. To this end we reduced prices on single volumes, arranged sets of books which we offered at less than half the original prices, and gave ceaseless thought and study to the evolving of other schemes for the benefit and assistance of our patrons. But now at the close of the year, we believe we have hit upon the best thing yet—the time payment idea.

The average citizen hesitates about paying out $10 or $25, all at one time, for books. He feels that he cannot afford it. At the same time, the average citizen can pay out $10 or $25, in monthly instalments of $2 or $3, and scarcely feel it. Therefore, in extending to our patrons the privilege of purchasing books on time payments, we are doing a great deal to make it easy for them to secure good literature.

The preacher who attempts to do his work without good books is as short-sighted and thoughtless as the carpenter who attempts to do good work with no tools but a hatchet and a rip-saw. The preacher who doesn't think it necessary to be constantly purchasing new books is the preacher who, while still in the prime of life, finds it first difficult and then impossible to secure a field of labor. Does some one reading these words dissent from them, and cry: "What's the matter with the good old Book? Isn't that enough for a preacher to preach?" Yea, verily, dearly beloved, but there be wise and gifted and godly men who have studied the good old Book and have found much therein that you have never found. The results of their studies they have published in books, and these books you should read, that your preaching may have some freshness about it, and not become a weariness to your hagrarg

Our new General Catalogue, a book of one hundred pages, profusely illustrated, is yours for the asking. Send for a copy if you have not already done so, select therefrom a list of books that you need, and then, if you do not wish to pay cash for them, send us the list. We will let you know the best terms we can allow you. If you like the terms, you can sign the agreement we send you, return it to us with the first payment, and we ship you the books. If you do not like the terms, you simply tear up the agreement and let the matter drop. It is certainly worth your while to investigate a little, and see what easy terms we can offer you.

Have you delayed until now ordering the Christian Lesson Commentary? Then delay no longer. This magnificent volume of 429 pages, beautifully and substantially bound in cloth and containing nearly two hundred illustrations, diagrams, maps, etc., stands at the head of all helps for the superintendent, teacher and advanced pupil of the Sunday-school. We make no exceptions in this claim. We believe it to be easily the best. Of course, as we publish and sell the book, it may be demurred that our judgment is likely to be biased. but it happens that the great majority of our leading Sunday-school workers say the same thing. The circulation of this splendid annual grows larger from year to year, and this year, judging from present prospects, the circulation will double that of last year. Price for single copy, postpaid, $1.00; per dozen, not prepaid, $9.00.

At the beginning of a new year, many churches and schools will require new record books. To churches we recommend the Moffett Register and Record as the best published, being complete, systematic and time-saving. It is arranged for roll of membership with space for recording when and how each member was received into fellowship, and when and how dismissed. There is space for minutes of official meetings, for financial receipts and disbursements, etc. It is printed on good paper and strongly bound. Price has been reduced to $2.00. A larger size, for the use of large city churches, costs $3.50.

Sunday-schools requiring new record books cannot do better than to send for our "Model" series. The Model Sunday-school Record provides for a complete record of the attendance of officers, teachers and pupils, collections by classes, total enrollment, with gain or loss for the quarter, list and cost of supplies, Treasurer's receipt to Secretary, weekly and quarterly reports, etc. Space for the records of twenty-eight classes. Each book contains blanks for two years' records. Bound in cloth; price, $1.00.

The Superintendent's Pocket Record is designed to contain an alphabetical list of the names and addresses of officers, teachers and pupils, and has space for recording some of the more important items from the weekly reports. Price, in cloth, $.50; in morocco, $.75. The Model S. S. Treasurer's Book is arranged for the systematic recording of all receipts and expenditures, and contains blanks for annual reports, etc. It is good for three years. And there are other requisites for first-class, up-to-date schools, such as blackboards, maps, bells, collection envelopes, etc., etc. We supply everything needed by Sunday-schools. We keep the best supplies, and only the best, and we sell them at honest prices. All our Sunday-school supplies, including the quarteries, lesson leaves, pap rs, etc., have always stood on their merits. We have never considered it either honest or necessary to bribe teachers and officers, by gifts of books, to select our supplies.

Christian Endeavor Societies, too, will need new supplies for the new year. These supplies are so cheap, consisting chiefly of cards—topic cards, application cards, pledge cards, invitation cards, etc.,—that every society can easily afford to have a sufficiency of them. We keep a complete stock of all C. E. supplies, price-list of which will be found elsewhere in this paper. Orders should be sent immediately, if they have not already been forwarded.

Our Special Christmas Catalogue did a good work. We are happy to say that our book trade during December has been the largest we have ever had. Our pairons have given substantial evidence of their appreciation of our efforts in their behalf. This little catalogue should be preserved. Except where it is expressly stated that a certain offer expires January 1, all the offers in the catalogue are still good, and will remain good during January and February. If your copy of the catalogue was a little late reaching you, and you had already purchased Christmas gifts, you may find in it something that you will want for yourself, or something to give to a friend whose birthday is at hand.

It is some time since we have said anything, in these notes, of Christian Science Dissected. The sale of this book goes right on. We are rapidly sending out the second edition, and before long must print a third." It is a great little book. We do not believe that it is possible for any intelligent, honest person to read it without becoming convinced that Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, the author and finisher of the Christian Science faith, is a fakir, fraud and charlatan. The writer of Christian Science Dissected has noted the absurdities of the Eddy doctrine, and presented them in a humorous way. This is just the book to hand to a friend who is being misled by the Eddyites.

—The Controversial Library. This is a set of eight great religious debates on Romanism, Baptism, Trine Immersion, Spiritualism, Mormonism, Universalism, Evidences of Christianity and The Holy Spirit in Conversion. The eight volumes are well bound, contain a total of 3,317 pages, and formerly sold for $13.00. Until February 1, 1901, we will send the set for $5.00.

Wheeling Through Europe has been having a great run lately. We have received orders for hundreds of copies during December. It is a book that deserves a very large sale, for it is excellent in every particular. The author's account of his bicycling tour through England, Scotland, Wales, France, Holland, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, Austria and Italy is a narrative that is never dull, for a single paragraph. The usual account of European travel consists of a series of descriptions of the "sights" of the capitals of Europe. Wheeling Through Europe is a different sort of book. The illustrations are splendid, the printing and binding fine. Price, $100.

Shem: a Story of the Captivity, is another book which is now in demand. It is, perhaps, the best book that Breckenridge Ellis has written. It is just the sort of book that fathers and mothers will enjoy reading and then passing on to the boys and girls. Mr. Ellis has evidently given much study to the customs, the habits, the social laws of the Jews of olden times, and his book is not only of absorbing interest, but is instructive as well. Price, $.50.

A few months ago your neighbor, perhaps, purchased the Standard Dictionary from an agent, paying $26 for it. The agent visited you, too, and tried to sell you the work. You admired it greatly—bound in full morocco, two volumes, the greatest lexicon of our language ever produced—and you would have taken it, but you didn't feel able to hand over the $26.00. It's just as well you waited, for now we will sell you exactly the same thing for $13.00, and permit you to pay for it in instalments, if you wish! You couldn't well give up $26.00 in a lump, but you can easily pay $3.00 down and $2.00 monthly for five months. Write to us about it.

The death of Prof. B. A. Hinsdale has been the occasion of a renewal of interest in his books. He was the author of a number of excellent volumes, three of the best of which we publish: Jesus as a Teacher, and the Making of the New Testament is a work of exceptional value to intelligent disciples, and one which has received high praise from the religious press of the country. It is a cloth-bound volume of 330 pages, 12 mo, price $1.25. The Genuineness and Authenticity of the Gospels is an argument, on historical and critical grounds, in favor of the genuineness of the four gospels Cloth, 12 mo, 276 pages; price, $1.25. Ecclesiastical Tradition is an account of the origin, the early growth, the place in the church and the value of ecclesiastical traditions. Cloth, 197 pages; price, $.75.
